The one significant fact in connection with this monthly visit of Mr. Fiedler and his men is that they have been accepted as an integral part of New York's musical life, and that though there seems to be an opera mad public which can not only stomach but apparently relish from eight to ten performances a week at the Metropolitan Opera House the circumstance does not interfere with the triumphal procession of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It would be gratifying to local pride, considering how unselfish a devotion is bestowed upon our own orchestral organizations by their particular patrons, if the same thing could be said of them.

From AMERICAN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pleasing Program Is Given at the Lyric.

Another great concert was given last evening at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fourth for the present season. Conductor Max Fiedler paid a well-deserved compliment to the memory of the finest and most cosmopolitan of all the Russian composers, Tschaikowsky, who was born in 1840 and died in 1893. Not only did he celebrate the centenary of one of Tschaikowsky's best-known works—The Overture to 1812—but he also gave him the entire program for the evening.

This is the first time such a recognition has been given in Baltimore to Tschaikowsky, whom the city's musical people have long since learned to love, and who honored Baltimore by a visit 20 years ago. Only three years before his death Tschaikowsky directed his own piano-cencerto for Miss Adele Ausderohe at Albaugh's Theater, and was entertained afterward, with special friends, by the late Ernest Knabe. No one who met the great composer at that time will ever forget either his noble appearance, his charming manners or his superb music.

The works given emphasized three phases: First, the pathetic nature of human life and ambition as exhibited by Tschaikowsky himself and illustrated in his B minor symphony; second, the innocence and joy of childhood as shown in all the characteristics of the Nutcracker ballet and the love of strength and power that belongs to the Russian character. The symphony shows the four ages of man. The first movement gives its infancy and childhood; the second, its youth and adolescence; the third, vigorous manhood; the fourth and last, adagio lamentoso, piping old age.

The Nutcracker music shows the bridge from childhood to fairyland, and the ease with which the child passes from broken toys to beautiful angels.

The overture to 1812 celebrates the victory of Tschaikowsky's native land over the man whom Beethoven first adored as an idol and afterward denounced as a tyrant. In the overture the Marseillaise is first heard in triumphant tones, followed by a struggle, in which the spirited song, then 10 years old, is made to yield to the Russian national anthem amid the ringing of Russian church bells, as Moscow burns and its enemies retreat.

The officers of the Philharmonic Chorus occupied a prominent box at the Lyric and sent Mr. Fiedler a magnificent floral offering. He divided the honors with his superb orchestra.

From EVENING JOURNAL,

Address New York City.

Date FEB 23 1912

Miss Farrar Vision of Pink and Green at Symphony Concert

By IRVING WEIL.

It was something of an evening of visions at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall. There were the feverstricken visions of the dying mortal of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," but before and after these merry conceits, before and after the motives of 105 degrees on the clinical thermometer, of death and the like, was the vision of Miss Geraldine Farrar, resplendent as the spirit of youth itself and attired beyond the dreams of any odalisque.

It was one of the little ironies that sometimes slip into programme-making, even when it is the programe-making of Conductor Max Fiedler, that Miss Farrar should have been, figuratively speaking, wrapped around the lugubrious Strauss death wrestle. And to make the irony still more delicious, she, as the vision of the odalisque, chose to sing the prayer of the saintly Elizabeth, out of "Tannhaeuser."

All of which goes to show that there is comedy even at a Boston Symphony concert.

But you must see Miss Farrar as the vision she was. Glimpse her, therefore, sweeping out upon the stage in a gown that was a subtle combination of rose pink and roseleaf green and ivory white, and above this thing that could not possibly be called by any less a name than a creation, a Turkish cap, romantic as any Occidental conception of the harem of the East, all in those same three colors. And, yes, one did glimpse the fact that there were ivory white slippers and—well, a bit of shimmering green just above them. Then you must add the full-lipped Farrar smile and the stately curtsey, as she bent before the showers of warm applause.

And Miss Farrar sang excellently well, if not altogether eloquently. That saintly coolness that should creep into the voice of Elizabeth at prayer was not there, but it is not to be imagined that it should have been. One could not imagine Elizabeth in that Turkish cap of rose pink and roseleaf green and ivory white, with its Oriental paradise plume.

Afterward Miss Farrar sang the "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme" of Schumann, Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Grieg's "Ein Traum." Her voice was heard in its full richness and beauty, but there is more variety of expressive color in these songs than she found in them.

Mr. Fiedler brought forward for the first time here the first of the three Roumanian Rhapsodies of Georges Enesco, the young Roumanian now living in Paris, who is so rapidly achieving a place in the forefront of composers of the day. This rhapsody is a stirring assemblage of Roumanian folk dances, revealed in effective orchestration, in which there is much originality of tonal color and reaching a gloriously barbaric finale.

The rest of the programme was taken up with a thoughtful reading of the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven and the Mozart overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." It is no longer necessary to comment upon the superb playing of the men from Boston.

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Estab 8

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Happily in the great audience which attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, or at least the great majority present, were understanding lovers of good music and not mere followers of a name or a fad. In consequence the splendid work of Anton Witek, concert master of the organization and soloist of the occasion, received the credit in appreciation and applause which it deserved.

Mr. Witek is an accomplished violinist of a very high order. There is poetic sympathy in his interpretation which appeals strongly to those who keep the beauties of the music above the personality of the performer. Especially is he effective in the artistic manner in which he turns from one movement to another with a grace and skill that is rare except in the best of violinists. His number was Wieniawski's concerto in D minor, No. 2, for violin and orchestra, and it was easily the leading feature of a brilliant program.

Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" was the opening number, followed by Schumann's symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61, which excited high enthusiasm in the audience, especially the third, or "adagio expressivo," movement. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" (Strauss) was beautifully played by the orchestra, and the closing number, Enesco's Roumanian rhapsody in A major, op. 11, No. 1, unique and difficult as it was, was exquisitely rendered.

Taken as a whole the program was one of the best the orchestra has presented this season, and Conductor Max Fiedler and his artistic aggregation never appeared to better advantage.

From TIMES

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date FEB 24 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD IN VARIED PROGRAMME

Mendelssohn, Franck and Tschaikowsky Given—Miss Collier Plays Saint-Saens' Concerto.

Variety of a highly interesting kind distinguished the programme presented by Max Feidler, onductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night.

Mendelssohn's lovely overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," served as an engaging introduction. The playing of this delightful piece of descriptive music was marked by the most delicate shadings. The airy grace of the fairy dances, the gay abandon of elfin gambols, the blithely humorous and bucolic elements were deftly brought out with customary precision and perfection of ensemble. Written when the composer was but seventeen, the overture has been popular for over eighty years. Cesar Franck's impressively thoughtful and interesting symphony in D minor was the significant feature of the evening's offering. The work has grown steadily in the esteem and respect of genuine music lovers. It is scholarly, original and wonderfully well written, and masterly in the working out and development of the composer's theories.

The work is in three movements. The first begins with a slow and grave introduction, which leads into an allegro non trappo, fascinating and absorbing in thematic treatment and development. The elaborate and happily free treatment of the fantasia is noteworthy. Charming is the allegretto, beginning with a gentle plaintiveness, which melts into a vivacious scherzo and a conspicuously beautiful ending. The finale is nobly optimistic in spirit with extraordinary vitality and expressiveness in treatment.

The orchestra played with evident enthusiasm. The performance, as a whole, was of rare merit and finish.

Miss Bessie Bell Collier was the soloist with Saint Saen's well known B minor concerto for violin and orchestra. Miss Collier is already well known to Brooklyn audiences and in her playing last night emphasized the impressions created by her former work. Miss Collier has a full tone, and plays with vigor and breadth. Her lower tones have almost a 'cello qaulity. She plays with assurance and temperament.

The concerto has a strong, easily understood appeal. The haunting beauty of the second movement met with the customary cordial appreciation of the audience. The nobility and dignity of the movement, with its richly effective ending won hearty commendation. Miss Collier was recalled and was the recipient of great bunches of flowers.

Tschaikowsky's tumultuous 1812 Overture completed the programme. It was given with spirit and notable cumulative power.

From EVENING GLOBE

Address New York

Date FEB 23 191

be imagined.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Little short of a revelation was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's playing of Richard Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung" last night. It fully deserves to take rank with the most inspired and inspiring achievements that have been heard this season. Both in the supreme grandeur of the tone produced by this superb organization and in the poetry of Max Fiedler's interpretation of this tremendous work the performance was positively epic. And, in truth, it wrung enthusiasm even from those to whom the name of Richard Strauss is anathema.

The only novelty on the programme was the Rhapsodie Roumaine in A major by Georges Enesco. It is light and unimportant, but agreeably melodious withal and of pungent rhythm. Throughout is a characteristic vein of semi-barbaric melancholy. The abrupt changes of tempo naturally suggest a comparison with the Hungarian rhapsodies. There, however, comparison ceases.

Astonishing was the psittacine headgear crowning the comely head of Miss Geraldine Farrar, who was the soloist of the occasion. Equally astonishing the treatment she meted out to Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser," a treatment evidently based on the assumption that the efficacy of prayers depends upon the loudness with which they are uttered. Her tone was shrill and strident, her pronunciation such that the words "Flehen," "Sehnen," "Fehl," sounded like "Fliehen," "Siehnen," "Fiehl." This is a solecism, however, from which many German singers are by no means free. Miss Farrar also sang Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin," and Grieg's "Ein Traum."

To return to more pleasant topics, Mr. Fiedler's reading of the fourth symphony of Beethoven was most satisfying. The orchestra brought out the serene loveliness of the adagio with a classic perfection to suggest a Phidian statue.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date FEB 24 191

IMMENSE BROOKLYN AUDIENCE HEARS D-MINOR SYMPHONY OF LATE BELGIAN MASTER, CESAR FRANCK, READ BY MAX FIEDLER, DIRECTING BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN PROGRAM WHICH INTRODUCES BESSIE BELL COLLIER, NEW VIOLINIST SCARCE OUT OF HER 'TEENS.

By Harry Chapin Plummer.

The performance was quite against the wish of most members of the famous Conservatoire Orchestra, and was only pushed through, thanks to the benevolent obstinacy of the conductor, Jules Garcin. The subscribers could make neither head nor tail of it, and the musical authorities were much in the same position. I inquired of one of them—a professor at the Conservatoire, and a kind of factotum on the committee—what he thought of the work. "That, a symphony?" he replied in contemptuous tones. "But, my dear sir, who ever heard of writing for the cor anglais in a symphony? Just mention a single symphony by Haydn or Beethoven introducing the cor anglais. There, well, you see—your Franck's music may be whatever you please, but it will certainly never be a symphony!" This was the attitude of the Conservatoire in the year of grace 1889.

At another door of the concert hall, the composer of "Faust" escorted by a train of adulators, male and female, fulminated a kind of papal decree to the effect that this symphony was the affirmation of incompetence pushed to dogmatic lengths. For sincerity and disinterestedness we must turn to the composer himself, when, on his return from the concert, his whole family surrounded him, asking eagerly for news. "Well, were you satisfied with the effect on the public? Was there plenty of applause?" To which "Father" Franck, thinking only of his work, replied with a beaming countenance: "Oh, it sounded well, just as I thought it would!"

—Vincent d'Indy in his "Life of Franck" (translation by Mrs. Rosa Newmarch).

As I listened last night to the reading of Cesar Franck's majestic D-minor symphony by Max Fiedler, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the New Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and observed the spontaneous outbursts of applause with which each of its three movements was received by an immense audience, I was reminded of the chronicle by d'Indy, himself a foremost contemporary French symphonic writer, of its original reception by a Parisian public. The passage of twenty-two years since its initial performance, February 17, 1889, has pedestaled Cesar Franck as the greatest of his school since Berlioz, and musicians the world over today hail the D-minor as the grandest of French symphonies.

Maestro Fiedler's best results were obtained last night in the first movement, the inspired and imaginative qualities of which were finely displayed under his conscientious, though somewhat phlegmatic beat. In the allegretto he appeared to keep to a too literal interpretation. The powerful unisono of the final movement was distinctly lacking in resonance, tonal volume and rhythmic esprit.

Last night's concert introduced in Miss Bessie Bell Collier, an American scarce out of her 'teens, a violinist new to the larger concert public of New York, who was cordially welcomed and yet more cordially acclaimed upon the conclusion of her playing with the orchestra of the B-minor concerto (No. 3, opus 61) of Camille Saint-Saens. One distinguishing trait of her work was a uniform clarity and sweetness of tone that lapses from pitch and imperfections of phrasing did not mar. Upon the principal subjects of the concerto she bestowed a voluptuous warmth of intonation and an innate passionateness of utterance, but the linking passage work was without luster. For her style it must be said that her least impressive effect appears to possess the germ of capability, of great artistic possibility. Certain it is that she has mastered the art of scintillating and glowing tone-production, due to a method of bowing that commands the interest of the beholder throughout. What of deficiency she evidenced was patently to be attributed to a slighting of the detail of left-hand finger play. I have heard older and more experienced players fall short of the general excellence of her rendition; and I have heard orchestras of less shining repute than the Boston band provide a more concrete background than that which was provided for Miss Collier.

The Mendelssohn overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," given with compelling finesse of treatment, and the overture "1812" of Tschaikowsky, for which some tremendous climaxes were builded, balanced the program of Gallic body.

[152]

From EVENING TELEGRAPH,
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 20 1912

supplemented the wild and sympathetic rendition of the score.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Variety, versatility and virtuosity marked the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy. And this, despite the fact that the program was not what might be called particularly attractive, except in spots. The orchestral piece de resistance was Beethoven's "Fourth Symphony in B flat major." It is not his most pleasing one by any means, though the Adagio is, as Berlioz says, a melodic expression of irresistible tenderness, a piece of prodigious art. The Symphony, as a whole, is rather disappointing. In fact, most critics praise it with much reserve, or else with tepid enthusiasm.

The other number which called for much orchestral virtuosity was the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," given with splendid dash and strong dramatic effect. The lighter numbers were Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," a dashing bit of melody, and the ever-delightful Prelude to "Lohengrin," played with genuine poetic feeling.

The soloist of the evening was Anton Witek, the Concert Master of the Orchestra. He chose Brahms' "Concerto in D major," a brilliant piece, but lacking in any particularly popular appeal. This Concerto was originally written for his friend, the versatile Joachim, who, it is said, found it most difficult to play. It is easy to believe it. It is showy, and abounds in cadenzas for the soloist, which, while they call for great technical ability, are mere tours de force. The Concerto adheres to conventional forms, but is florid and rather too full of orchestral fury to be generally pleasing. Herr Witek acquitted himself with credit. His tone, while broad and full, is a trifle hard and lacking in sweetness. He possesses great technical ability, which would undoubtedly show to better advantage in a more congenial selection. The demands which this Concerto make upon the soloist tend to render it difficult to adhere to the pitch with absolute fidelity, and the result is not always or altogether satisfying.

The Orchestra will give its fifth and final concert on Monday, March 18, when Mr. Fiedler, much to the regret of every music lover, will conduct his splendid band for the last time in Philadelphia. Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, will be the soloist.

From EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
FEB 23 1912
Date

MR. MASON'S MUSICAL REVIEW

Of the Programme to Be Given Tonight by Boston Symphony.

In lecture hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Daniel Gregory Mason of Manhattan gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in the opera house of that building tonight. He devoted his attention to Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, which constitute the first two numbers, after playing a brief portion of Saint-Saens' Concerto in B minor, for violin and orchestra, in which Miss Bessie Bell Collier will play the solo part, and characterizing the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812," opus 49, which closes the programme, as "noisy." It was written for performance in an open square at the time of the consecration of the Church of the Redeemer in Moscow.

Mendelssohn wrote the overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" when he was 17 years old, adding the "Wedding March" and other portions of the music for the play sixteen or eighteen years later. In playing the overture, in part, Mr. Mason called attention to the "heehaw" of the ass, which Mendelssohn introduced as typical of Bottom in his transmogrification.

The Franck symphony was said to be a wonderfully thoughtful work and interesting in its application of the composer's theory of the use of a theme, in one movement, in following other movements, thus unifying the whole. The first movement, Mr. Mason said, is beautiful, but perhaps too thoughtful. In excerpts the speaker, at the piano, exemplified Franck's fondness for chromatic harmonization, for placing melodies in the bass, and thus making them very expressive, for use of the canon form, for contrapuntal or polyphonic way of writing, and for repetition of phrase by various instruments. Mr. Mason played the themes with interpretative comment, but gave most of the time to playing those portions of the symphony which lend themselves to presentation on the piano. He said that the symphony, though probably a little monotonous compared with those by Beethoven, is wonderfully fine in the way it is elaborated.

From EVE. POST.
New York City.
Address
FEB 23 1912
Date

Boston Symphony Concert.

The soloist at last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra was Miss Geraldine Farrar. She sang Elizabeth's prayer, from "Tannhäuser," and a group of songs accompanied by piano. The orchestra's programme began with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, then there were Beethoven's fourth symphony, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and the Rumanian Rhapsody of Enesco. The usual large audience filled Carnegie Hall's seating capacity.

Miss Farrar was in very good voice, and sang the prayer beautifully, but without her usual conscientious regard for shading and the sentiment of the text. It seems a pity that the Metropolitan management do not permit her to sing the part of Elizabeth, which is one of her best rôles. Mr. Fiedler's accompaniment was labored and dragging. Otherwise, the performance of the orchestra was excellent. The strings sounded more mellow than they have of late. Mozart's overture went with much spirit, and the first movement of the Beethoven symphony, by far the most interesting of the four, was especially good. It was a foregone conclusion that the Strauss tone-poem would be played admirably by Mr. Fiedler and his men, as Mr. Fiedler is such an admirer of the German Berlioz. This particular work of Strauss will be heard twice more within the next few weeks, next Thursday night by the Philharmonic, while in March it will be played by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. There are some great climaxes which the Boston orchestra made the most of, as Mr. Fiedler is not afraid of noise.

Miss Farrar's songs were Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin," and Grieg's superb "Ein Traum," a song which is not only beautiful, but brilliant, and grateful for the voice. This song was applauded more than all the others put together—a hint to other singers. Miss Farrar sang the whole group charmingly.

Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody in A major, which closed the concert, is delightful, rhythmically and melodically, and he has kept the orchestration appropriate to the national airs he has used. It is rich, but the orchestra gave a fine

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
FEB 24 1912
Date

FOURTH OF THE SERIES BY BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Only one Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Brooklyn remains to be heard this season, and the series is already being spoken of as the most notable musical event Brooklyn has yet seen. The fame of this organization, that most people are sure is the best in America, while many more assert it is pre-eminent in the whole world of music, has been sufficient to crowd the Academy to its doors at each concert. Last night, even though the soloist announced bore a name practically unknown, there was the same huge audience that grew just as enthusiastic as ever over the evidences of perfection. Certainly no one can criticize the technical excellence of the orchestra or its degree of success from an interpretative standpoint.

The programme opened with the fairy music of Mendelssohn—the overture of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Especially fine was the work of the reinforced woodwind choir in this number. All the delicacy and playfulness of the score was apparent, and the old familiar overture proved a most appropriate selection with which to start the evening. Some "sterner stuff" came next—the Cesar Franck Symphony in D Minor—the sequence furnishing to students of music an admirable comparison of the musical fashions of two centuries. Unlike many symphonies the Franck masterpiece is a unified, finished whole. The same stirring, majestic theme that occurs in the opening movement is heard booming through the finale as well. A marvelous bit of technical skill is the manner in which the earlier motives are entwined and entangled together in the final movement. The symphony is rather long, but it is a noble work, and the interpretation of Mr. Fiedler's band of musicians was far above criticism.

Miss Bessie Bell Collier, the violinist who carried the house by storm with her playing of the difficult Saint-Saens concerto in B minor, is a youthful American girl, who plays with a fine spirit and dash. The second movement, which centres about a folk-song melody, gave her an opportunity to demonstrate her mastery over the singing tones of her instrument—the very tones for which audiences are craving at most violin recitals. With the magnificent background furnished by the big orchestra the instrument rang out true, clear and mellow. This is the second young woman violinist the Boston Symphony has brought out at the Academy of Music this season, and like Kathleen Parlow, the new soloist jumped into immediate favor.

The patriotic "1812" overture of Tschaikowsky closed the programme. This is the piece commemorative of Napoleon's rout at Moscow, which represents by the triumph of the Russian national anthem over the "Marsellaise," with the aid of a t... band, great drum... (they were cannon in the original production) and church bells clanging. Mr. Fiedler worked his orchestra up to a stupendous though noisy climax, and surely if any Russians were present their feelings must have been at the boiling point.

From SUN
New York
Address
FEB 23 1912
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Geraldine Farrar Sings Elizabeth's Prayer in a Determined Manner.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening had two features which demand special comment this morning. One was the singing of Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser," the third number on the programme, by Miss Geraldine Farrar, prima donna soprano of the Metpolitan Opera House, and the playing of Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung" by the orchestra under the inspiring direction of Conductor Max Fiedler.

Miss Farrar was attired in the most gorgeous and striking manner, but that is of course not a matter for critical comment. But her singing of the touching prayer of Elizabeth was something not only open to critical comment, but actually clamoring for it. The air is usually sung piano; Miss Farrar, who apparently rejoices in opportunities to shatter the most cherished traditions, sang it in full voice, with very little nuance and an abundance of tone quality which could not have ravished any sensitive ear. Her entire reading of the lovely air was deficient in technical beauty and interpretative sentiment.

Mr. Fielder and the gentlemen of Boston glorified Strauss's music and themselves. The noble peroration of the work was reached in a subtly planned series of gradations and when it came its tonal proclamation was nothing short of stupendous. The performance of this work was a demonstration of what the Boston orchestra can do at its best.

The other orchestral numbers on the programme were Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, Beethoven's fourth symphony and Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody" in A major, opus 11, No. 1. This work, which is pleasing but of slight importance, was heard for the first time in this city. Just before this number Miss Farrar sang with piano accompaniment Schumann's "Intermezzo" and "Ihre Stimme," Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Grieg's "Ein Traum."

From SUN
New York
Address
Date
FEB 25 1912

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Alwyn Schroeder Plays a Cello Composition by Tschaikowsky.

The fourth afternoon concert of th... Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carneg... Hall yesterday was delightful, but n... of the kind that emands profound con... ment. The orchestral numbers we... Schumann's C major symphony, Strauss... "Til Eulenspiegel" and Wagner's "Flyi... Dutchman" overture. The solo pe... former was Alwyn Schroeder, one of t... cellists of he orchestra and former... cellist of the Kneisel Quartet. He play... Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Ro... coco Theme."

These variations are of very slig... texture, but they are well suited to t... utterance of the violoncello. While th... do not call upon it for the expression... any large emotion such as the instrum... can well sing, they do ask of it perfecti... of cantilena as well as a floridity whi... does not violate its dingity. M... Schroeder is no stranger to this publ... His art is ripe and filled with the repo... which comes from authority. His pe... formance yesterday was a model of bea... tiful tone, finished technic and elega... style. The audience received it wi... uncommon enthusiasm, recalling the ... tist no less than eight times.

While the performance of the Schuma... symphony was uplifting, the centi... achievement of the orchestra was its de... livery of the humorous rondo of Mr. Strauss. This composition at each hearing renews the conviction that for sheer orchestral virtuosity it has not its fellow. There are phrases which arouse the ire of adorers of the mellow clarinet or the plaintive oboe, but they are such wickedly ingenious proclamations of ribald jest, boisterous merriment or sardonic humor, that they extort admiration even from the unwilling.

Max Fiedler is one of the apostles of Strauss and conducts his music with communicative enthusiasm. The performance of the great rondo yesterday was one to call for the warmest praise. It was a magnificent instrument upon which the conductor had to play, and he played upon it like a master.

From AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
Address
FEB 1 1912
Date

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight.

The Boston Symphony will give the fourth concert of the season at the Lyric Theater tonight at 8:15 o'clock. The program will be devoted entirely to music by Tschaikowsky. It is as follows: Elegie for string from Serenade, opus 48; symphony in B minor No. 6 pathetic; suite, Nutcracker, for full orchestra; overture, 1812.

From CITIZENS
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
FEB 24 1912
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FOURTH CONCERT

Splendidly Played Programme at the Academy.

MISS COLLIER THE SOLOIST

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Exquisitely Rendered—Franck, Saint-Saens and Tschaikowski Works Also Finely Done.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, was given at the Academy of Music last evening. Miss Bessie Belle Collier was the soloist appearing in the Saint Saens violin concerto in B minor, and the remainder of the programme included: Mendelssohn's Overture to a "Midsummer Night's Dream," Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor and Tschaikowsky's overture, "1812."

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" still remains unmatched in compositions of its class in its humor, as in the drone of the snoring Batton on the bass tuba, in its gayety and lightness of touch, as in the dainty tripping dance of the fairies, in the buzzing figure given out and developed by divided violins, with pizzicati in the violas, in its clarity of instrumentation and its perfection of form. No other orchestra can approach the Boston Symphony in the rendition of music such as this. No other orchestra can produce a pianissimo as light as gossamer and as pure and sweet as the tones of an Amati violin.

The symphony of Cesar Frank was hailed upon its appearance by his devoted pupils and followers as "majestic, plastic, of solid workmanship," and its themes as "manifestations of ideal beauty," and by his detractors as the "affirmation of incompetence pushed to dogmatic lengths." As in all such cases the truth of the matter seems to lie in the "golden mean" of the Greeks.

The most marked feature of this symphony is a recurrence of themes from the earlier movement in the later and the importance attached to the main theme of the introduction. A plaintive lento first movement is succeeded by a charming allegretto second movement, pizzicati upon the strings and harp over which the English horn sings a mournful strain. In the coda of the last movement there is a grouping of the principal themes of the first and second movements aroused the main theme of the finale.

It was superbly played, of course, and the orchestration of the score is a marvel; for although the usual brass is augmented, yet by keeping the range of these instruments in the lower register where their upper partials, or overtones are less brilliant, their sonority does not clash with the less brilliant timbre of the strings, and in fact the manner in which the various choirs of the orchestra are kept distinct, and at the same time welded into the structure of the whole is little short of marvelous.

Miss Collier, very becomingly gowned, played Saint Saens' charming concerto very charmingly, and received as a reward an armful of beautiful flowers.

The concert closed with Tschaikowsky's patriotic overture, "The Year 1812," which is the 1776 of the Russians. It was written at the suggestion of Nicholas Rubinstein as a festival overture to commemorate the rebuilding of the Cathedral of Moscow, which had been burned by the French. Russian national life is characterized by the introduction of peasant dances; the defiant challenge of the "Marseillaise" dies away and is overpowered by the strains of the Russian National Hymn on the full orchestra, while a carrilon intones the joyous pealing of the Cathedray bells.

From EVENING STAR
Baltimore, Md.
Address
Date

Symphony Concert Tonight.

The Boston Symphony will give the fourth concert of the season at the Lyric Theater tonight at 8:15 o'clock. The program will be devoted entirely to music by Tschaikowsky. It is as follows: Elegie for string from Serenade, opus 48; symphony in B minor No. 6 pathetic; suite, Nutcracker, for full orchestra; overture, 1812.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York
Address
FEB 25 1912
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," were the two works of importance that the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Carnegie Hall at Thursday night's concert. Geraldine Farrar, the soloist, chose "Elisabeth's Prayer" for her opening number.

[153]

From HERALD

Address NEW YORK CITY FEB 23 1912

Date

MISS FARRAR SINGS IN STARTLING GOWN

Is Soloist with the Boston Orchestra, Which Is Note Perfect in Concert.

That sedate band of harmony the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night, and Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan, was the soloist. She was more than that, for she was really startling. She wore a gown that appeared to be a combination of crimson, turquoise blue, light blue and white, queerly slashed, gashed and cut. She wore a turban of gold and crimson, with flaring blue feathers in front. At times it looked like some Indian head dress, at others the effect was that of a modish goddess of liberty.

Waving a huge ostrich plume fan, Miss Farrar sang the prayer from "Tannhaeuser." The whole combination of gown, turban, fan and prayer seemed incongruous. She sang it well, but with full voice and without much sentiment. It seemed an odd and unhappy number to have chosen. Later, with piano accompaniment, she sang a group of songs, the most charming of which was Sinding's "Sylvelin." She received many recalls.

Under Mr. Max Fiedler's baton the Boston orchestra played note perfect again last night. Mr. Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" was stirringly done, every nuance being heeded, every detail nursed without any sacrifice of general sweeping effect.

Mr. George Enesco's Roumanian rhapsody, No. 1, was another feat of virtuosity. Its composer is court violinist to the Queen of Roumania and this brilliant composition, which is a sheer delight, is based upon Roumanian airs. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" completed the list of pieces, both admirably played. Twice during the evening did the orchestra have to arise and bow in answer to applause.

From PRESS

Address New York

Date

VETERAN 'CELLIST APPEARS IN TSCHAIKOWSKY NUMBER

Schroeder Again Makes Excellent Impression Playing with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In bringing forward as the soloist of yesterday's matinee in Carnegie Hall that much and justly beloved veteran of the 'cello, Alwin Schroeder, one of the most highly prized members of its own organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, once more presented to its subscribers an artist worthy of such distinction, an artist in the best sense of the word, scorning all superficial display, incapable of offending in the slightest degree the canons of good taste, content to rely solely on legitimate performance in inviting public approval.

Tschaikowsky's "Variations on Roccoco Theme," for 'cello with orchestral accompaniment, is a piece surely that presents no small difficulties. It offers opportunities which might easily tempt a virtuoso to flaunt his skill in flashy display. Schroeder, however, maintained his characteristic dignity and poise, though at first he seemed a little nervous; coped brilliantly, if unostentatiously, with the technical obstacles of the work and played with the intelligence, taste and feeling of a true musician. That his efforts won enthusiastic approval was shown by the number of times he had to return in answering spontaneous and heartfelt applause.

Strangely enough the concert revealed the orchestra not only at its best, but almost at its worst. It is impossible to recall a more beautifully finished euphonious, poetic and spirited performance of Schumann's symphony in C major, No. 2, than that which opened the afternoon. Exquisite in its sheer sensuous loveliness and transparency was the adagio, in which woodwind and strings vied with one another in quality and expressiveness of tone; deeply touching the tenderness and pathos which breathed from Fiedler's finely shaded reading. Full of romantic ardor and exuberant impulse was the final allegro, with its inspired echoes of earlier thematic ideas.

Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," on the other hand, fell far below the Boston orchestra's technical standards. The performance it received, though robust and vigorous, showed a decided lack of dynamic balance, clarity of exposition, rhythmical unanimity and precision. It seemed as if Fiedler had not drilled and rehearsed his musicians sufficiently for their task. Yet he asked them all to stand up in recognition of the applause. Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture brought the concert to a close. M. S.

From EVENING NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md. FEB 23 1912

Dat

Est

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Gives Concert Composed Entirely Of Compositions By Tschaikowsky.

Some erudite musicians feel that Tschaikowsky is a passing fancy; that his music is too demonstratively emotional to be truly strong and, therefore, long-lived. Music is an emotional language, and the great Russian employed more of its limitless expressive range than have most of the masters, although his moods were more often somber than joyful, but he was always intense.

Those carping critics who pronounce the Tschaikowsky symphonies ephemeral fail to fully apprehend either his intensity, versatility or exhaustive command of technic. Tschaikowsky is always graphic, and his fancies bear as clear a stamp of individuality as do those of Beethoven or Schumann. He wrote real music, but was naturally much influenced by the spirit of the times and environment in which he lived. It would, therefore, be obviously unjust to measure the virtues of his product with an unadjusted gauge. There are few composers, old or new, whose works could furnish sufficiently diverse moods to fill an entire program without engendering some degree of monotony. Wagner and Tschaikowsky are the two who suffer least from the continued presentation of their individualities, not because their works are greater, but because their imaginations wandered into widely separated and less familiar fields.

Two years after Tschaikowsky's death his friend, Leopold Auer (the teacher of Elman, Zimbalist and Parlow), came from St. Petersburg to Berlin and gave a memorable concert devoted to Tschaikowsky's works. The program was the Symphony No. 2, "Francesa di Rimini"; the nut-cracker suite and the violin concerto, which was ideally played by the concert giver himself. Auer is a great conductor as well as a great violinist, and being in perfect sympathy with Tschaikowsky's spirit, he made that function a never-to-be-forgotten delight, which caused enthusiasm to grow to unrestrained jubilation. There is perhaps no orchestral music which requires such fine adjustments and such unaffected reading as does Tschaikowsky's. He is often rhapsodic, but never illogical.

Mr. Fiedler presented the following well-chosen program:

Elegia from Serenade for orchestra of strings, op. 48. Symphony in B minor, No. 6, "Pathetic," op. 74. Suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker," op. 71a. Overture, "1812," op. 49 (Tschaikowsky).

The Elegia is a lyric of beauty, but it impresses one as having been taken from the surface of the great composer's deep well-spring. It was admirably played. The first part of the "Pathetic" was disappointing, for one missed the clarity and natural rhythmic fluctuations which are essential to its effectiveness. Mr. Fiedler seemed less in touch with this music than he is with the more conventional. The balance of the symphony and the suite were very effectively rendered. O. B. B.

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City FEB 23 1912

Date

Estab

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall vor gänzlich gefüllten Saal abgehaltene Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler verlief in glänzendster Weise. Die Ouvertüre zu Mozart's „Hochzeit des Figaro" konnte man nicht häufig mit so viel Klan- und Virtuosität spielen hören, als es gestern der Fall war. Beethoven's 4. Symphonie dirigirte Herr Fiedler mit gedrungener Kraft und feinster technischer Ausarbeitung. Strauß' „Tod und Verklärung" brachte wahre Wunder an brillantem Tonkolorit.

Neu war Enesco's „Rumänische Rhapsodie" in A-Dur Op. 11, No. 1, ein Orchesterstück von sehr gefälliger melodischer Erfindung und origineller Orchestertechnik, das wir unbedingt zu den schönsten Tonschöpfungen der letzten Zeit rechnen müssen. Frl. Farrar, angethan mit einem indianisch-anmuthenden Kostüm und einer Art Barett mit hohen Federn, war, lebhaft gefeiert, die Solistin. Sie sang Elisabeth's Gebet aus dem „Tannhäuser" etwas unruhig und mit gelegentlich unbotmäßiger Höhe und in der zweiten Abtheilung mehrere Lieder, namentlich Grieg's „Ein Traum" sehr gefällig und erfolgreich. Das Orchester fand nach sämmtlichen Nummern demonstrativen Beifall.

MONITOR,

FEBRUARY 24, 1912

Leader of Toronto Choir Joins Frederick Stock in Presenting Program

(Photo by Moffett Studio, Chicago)
A. S. VOGT

* * *

The Flonzaley quartet gives its last concert of chamber music in Jordan hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 29, at 8:15. The concert brings to an end one of the most successful seasons the organization has had. The program is as follows: Mozart, quartet in D major, No. 2; Beethoven, quartet in F minor, Op. 95; Glazounoff, interludium in modo antico, and Scherzo from the quartet in A minor.

* * *

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, who was last heard in Boston in 1908, gives a recital in Jordan hall on Saturday afternoon, March 2.

taking that will cost more, say the managers, than the concerts can bring in.

program is as follows: Overture, "...esfruhling," Op. 28, Georg Schu...n, Theodore Thomas orchestra; Mo... "Crucifixus," Lotti, Motet, Psalm ... Gounod, Mendelssohn choir; "Judex C...deris," from "Te Deum," Berlioz, M...delssohn choir and Theodore Thomas or...estra; "Traume," a study to "Tris...and Isolde," Wagner (arranged for co...ert performance by Theodore Th...nas); Bacchanale, from "Tannhauser" Wagner, Theodore Thomas orchestra; "Sanctus," from B minor Mass, Ba... Mendelssohn choir and Theodore Th...as orchestra. Intermission. "Ave Ma... Stella," Grieg, Mendelssohn choir; "L...ra Me," from "Manzoni" Requiem, Ve... for soprano solo, chorus and or... ch...ra, Miss Florence Hinkle, Mendelssohn choir and Theodore Thomas orchestra; "Night Witchery," von Storch, "N...ingham Hunt," Bullard, men's v...es of the Mendelssohn choir; Symphonic Waltz, Op. 8, Stock, Theodore Th...mas orchestra; Scottish Folk-Song, ar...anged by Granville Bantock, "Hey No...ino," double chorus, Op. 24, Howard B...ckway, Mendelssohn choir; Chorale, "A...ake," and Choral Finale, "M...ersinger," Wag... Mendelssohn choir and Theo... Thomas orchestra.

Heinrich Gebhard, the Boston pianist, appears with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the matinee rehearsal of Friday, March 1, and at the evening concert of Saturday, March 2. The program chosen by Mr. Fiedler for these concerts is as follows:

Beethoven, overture, "Egmont;" Brahms, symphony in D-major, No. ... Liszt, concerto in A-major for ... and orchestra; Berlioz, overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Miss Katharine Goodson will be the soloist at the sixth symphony concert in Cambridge in Sanders theater, Thursday evening, Feb. 29. She will play the Saint-Saens concerto for piano and orchestra in G-minor, No. 2. The program is as follows: Weber, overture, "Euryanthe;" Schumann, symphony in C-major, No. 2; Saint-Saens, concerto in G-minor, No. 2; Wagner, prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde."

The second concert in aid of the pen-

Soprano Who Assists at Choral and Orchestral Concert in Symphony Hall

(Photo by Mishkin Studio, New York)
MISS FLORENCE HINKLE

sion fund of the Symphony orchestra takes place in Symphony hall Sunday evening, March ... The soloist is Miss Elena Gerh... the German song interpreter.

* * *

The principal musical announcement of the coming week is the concert in Symphony hall Thursday evening by the Mendelssohn choir of Toronto and the Theodore Thomas orchestra of Chicago. These two organizations are giving three concerts in the East, two in New York on Tuesday and Wednesday nights, and the concert in Boston on Thursday evening. The Mendelssohn choir is said to have a large surplus from concerts given in Toronto and surrounding cities in the last few years. To bring 225 singers and an orchestra of 80 to New York and Boston is an under-

[154]

JOURNAL-

MARCH 4, 1912

CONCERT IN AID OF PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Program Attracts Large Audience.

Max Fiedler conducted his sixth and final Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert at Symphony Hall last night. He made up an exceedingly attractive program, including such sterling Tschaikowsky works as the "Pathetic Symphony," which had not been heard here since the fifth concert of his first season; the light and delectable "Nutcracker Suite," which he introduced to Symphony patrons on Christmas eve, 1908, and the big "1812 Overture."

Miss Gerhardt Sings

To complete the excellent features there was Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German lieder singer, offering three of Wagner's songs with orchestra, "Stehe still," "Traeume" and "Schmerzen," and also a group of Schumann songs, with piano accompaniment played by Miss Paula Hegner.

The audience was large, and probably but for the bitter cold night it would have filled the hall, for the Tschaikowsky music is very popular here and Miss Gerhardt has made many admirers with her beautiful art. It was well worth going to this concert simply to hear her highly poetical interpretations of the "Treume" song.

Auditors Enthusiastic

The "Pathetic Symphony" was performed with all the virtuoso power for which the orchestra is famed, and the players were deservedly applauded until they rose to bow for themselves. Mr. Nagel's celesta solo in the "Nutcracker Suite" and the charming flute playing of Messrs. Marquarre, Brooke and Battles also received special compliments from the enthusiastic auditors. The orchestra acknowledged Miss Gerhardt's generous offer of her services with a huge wreath decorated with the German tricolor.

From HERALD

Address NEW YORK CITY FEB 23 1912

Date

MISS FARRAR SINGS IN STARTLING GOWN

Estab

Is Soloist with the Boston Orchestra, Which Is Note Perfect in Concert.

That sedate band of harmony the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night, and Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan, was the soloist. She was more than that, for she was really startling. She wore a gown that appeared to be a combination of crimson, turquoise blue, light blue and white, queerly slashed, gashed and cut. She wore a turban of gold and crimson, with flaring blue feathers in front. At times it looked like some Indian head dress, at others the effect was that of a modish goddess of liberty.

Waving a huge ostrich plume fan, Miss Farrar sang the prayer from "Tannhaeuser." The whole combination of gown, turban, fan and prayer seemed incongruous. She sang it well, but with full voice and without much sentiment. It seemed an odd and unhappy number to have chosen. Later, with piano accompaniment, she sang a group of songs, the most charming of which was Sinding's "Sylvelin." She received many recalls.

Under Mr. Max Fiedler's baton the Boston orchestra played note perfect again last night. Mr. Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" was stirringly done, every nuance being heeded, every detail nursed without any sacrifice of general sweeping effect.

Mr. George Enesco's Roumanian rhapsody, No. 1, was another feat of virtuosity. Its composer is court violinist to the Queen of Roumania and this brilliant composition, which is a sheer delight, is based upon Roumanian airs. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" completed the list of pieces, both admirably played. Twice during the evening did the orchestra have to arise and bow in answer to applause.

From PRESS

Address New York

Date

VETERAN 'CELLIST APPEARS IN TSCHAIKOWSKY NUMBER

Schroeder Again Makes Excellent Impression Playing with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In bringing forward as the soloist of yesterday's matinee in Carnegie Hall that much and justly beloved veteran of the 'cello, Alwin Schroeder, one of the most highly prized members of its own organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, once more presented to its subscribers an artist worthy of such distinction, an artist in the best sense of the word, scorning all superficial display, incapable of offending in the slightest degree the canons of good taste, content to rely solely on legitimate performance in inviting public approval.

Tschaikowsky's "Variations on Roccoco Theme," for 'cello with orchestral accompaniment, is a piece surely that presents no small difficulties. It offers opportunities which might easily tempt a virtuoso to flaunt his skill in flashy display. Schroeder, however, maintained his characteristic dignity and poise, though at first he seemed a little nervous; coped brilliantly, if unostentatiously, with the technical obstacles of the work and played with the intelligence, taste and feeling of a true musician. That his efforts won enthusiastic approval was shown by the number of times he had to return in answering spontaneous and heartfelt applause.

Strangely enough the concert revealed the orchestra not only at its best, but almost at its worst. It is impossible to recall a more beautifully finished euphonious, poetic and spirited performance of Schumann's symphony in C major, No. 2, than that which opened the afternoon. Exquisite in its sheer sensuous loveliness and transparency was the adagio, in which woodwind and strings vied with one another in quality and expressiveness of tone; deeply touching the tenderness and pathos which breathed from Fiedler's finely shaded reading. Full of romantic ardor and exuberant impulse was the final allegro, with its inspired echoes of earlier thematic ideas.

Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," on the other hand, fell far below the Boston orchestra's technical standards. The performance it received, though robust and vigorous, showed a decided lack of dynamic balance, clarity of exposition, rhythmical unanimity and precision. It seemed as if Fiedler had not drilled and rehearsed his musicians sufficiently for their task. Yet he asked them all to stand up in recognition of the applause. Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture brought the concert to a close. M. S.

From EVENING NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md. FEB 23 1912

Dat

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Est

Gives Concert Composed Entirely Of Compositions By Tschaikowsky.

Some erudite musicians feel that Tschaikowsky is a passing fancy; that his music is too demonstratively emotional to be truly strong and, therefore, long-lived. Music is an emotional language, and the great Russian employed more of its limitless expressive range than have most of the masters, although his moods were more often somber than joyful, but he was always intense.

Those carping critics who pronounce the Tschaikowsky symphonies ephemeral fail to fully apprehend either his intensity, versatility or exhaustive command of technic. Tschaikowsky is always graphic, and his fancies bear as clear a stamp of individuality as do those of Beethoven or Schumann. He wrote real music, but was naturally much influenced by the spirit of the times and environment in which he lived. It would, therefore, be obviously unjust to measure the virtues of his product with an unadjusted gauge. There are few composers, old or new, whose works could furnish sufficiently diverse moods to fill an entire program without engendering some degree of monotony. Wagner and Tschaikowsky are the two who suffer least from the continued presentation of their individualities, not because their works are greater, but because their imaginations wandered into widely separated and less familiar fields.

Two years after Tschaikowsky's death his friend, Leopold Auer (the teacher of Elman, Zimbalist and Parlow), came from St. Petersburg to Berlin and gave a memorable concert devoted to Tschaikowsky's works. The program was the Symphony No. 2, "Francesa di Rimini"; the nut-cracker suite and the violin concerto, which was ideally played by the concert giver himself. Auer is a great conductor as well as a great violinist, and being in perfect sympathy with Tschaikowsky's spirit, he made that function a never-to-be-forgotten delight, which caused enthusiasm to grow to unrestrained jubilation. There is perhaps no orchestral music which requires such fine adjustments and such unaffected reading as does Tschaikowsky's. He is often rhapsodic, but never illogical.

Mr. Fiedler presented the following well-chosen program:

Elegia from Serenade for orchestra of strings, op. 48. Symphony in B minor, No. 6, "Pathetic," op. 74. Suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker," op. 71a. Overture, "1812," op. 49 (Tschaikowsky).

The Elegia is a lyric of beauty, but it impresses one as having been taken from the surface of the great composer's deep well-spring. It was admirably played. The first part of the "Pathetic" was disappointing, for one missed the clarity and natural rhythmic fluctuations which are essential to its effectiveness. Mr. Fiedler seemed less in touch with this music than he is with the more conventional. The balance of the symphony and the suite were very enjoyably rendered. O. B. B.

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City FEB 25 1912

Date

Estab

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall vor gänzlich gefüllten Saal abgehaltene Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler verlief in glänzendster Weise. Die Ouvertüre zu Mozart's „Hochzeit des Figaro" konnte man nicht häufig mit so viel Elan und Virtuosität spielen hören, als es gestern der Fall war. Beethoven's 4. Symphonie dirigirte Herr Fiedler mit gedrungener Kraft und feinster technischer Ausarbeitung. Strauß' „Tod und Verklärung" brachte wahre Wunder an brillantem Tonkolorit.

Neu war Enesco's „Rumänische Rhapsodie" in A-Dur Op. 11, No. 1, ein Orchesterstück von sehr gefälliger melodischer Erfindung und origineller Orchestertechnik, das wir unbedingt zu den schönsten Tonschöpfungen der letzten Zeit rechnen müssen. Frl. Farrar, angethan mit einem indianisch-anmuthenden Kostüm und einer Art Barett mit hohen Federn, war, lebhaft gefeiert, die Solistin. Sie sang Elisabeth's Gebet aus dem „Tannhäuser" etwas unruhig und mit gelegentlich unbotmäßige Höhe und in der zweiten Abtheilung mehrere Lieder, namentlich Grieg's „Ein Traum" sehr gefällig und erfolgreich. Das Orchester fand nach sämmtlichen Nummern demonstrativen Beifall.

MONITOR,

FEBRUARY 24, 1912

Leader of Toronto Choir Joins Frederick Stock in Presenting Program

(Photo by Moffett Studio, Chicago)
A. S. VOGT

* * *

The Flonzaley quartet gives its last concert of chamber music in Jordan hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 29, at 8:15. The concert brings to an end one of the most successful seasons the organization has had. The program is as follows: Mozart, quartet in D major, No. 2; Beethoven, quartet in F minor, Op. 95; Glazounoff, interludium in modo antico, and Scherzo from the quartet in A minor.

* * *

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, who was last heard in Boston in 1908, gives a recital in Jordan hall on Saturday afternoon, March 2.

taking that will cost more, say the managers, than the concerts can bring in.

program is as follows: Overture, "[illegible]esfruhling," Op. 28, Georg Schuma, Theodore Thomas orchestra; Motet, "Crucifixus," Lotti, Motet, Psalm 13[illegible] Gounod, Mendelssohn choir; "Judex Cleris," from "Te Deum," Berlioz, Mendelssohn choir and Theodore Thomas orchestra; "Traume," a study to "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner (arranged for concert performance by Theodore Thomas); Bacchanale, from "Tannhauser," Wagner, Theodore Thomas orchestra; "Sanctus," from B minor Mass, Bach, Mendelssohn choir and Theodore Thomas orchestra. Intermission. "Ave Maris Stella," Grieg, Mendelssohn choir; "Lacrymosa Me," from "Manzoni" Requiem, Verdi, for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, Miss Florence Hinkle, Mendelssohn choir and Theodore Thomas orchestra; "Night Witchery," von Storch, "Nottingham Hunt," Bullard, men's voices of the Mendelssohn choir; Symphonic Waltz, Op. 8, Stock, Theodore Thomas orchestra; Scottish Folk-Song, arranged by Granville Bantock, "Hey Nonino," double chorus, Op. 24, Howard Brockway, Mendelssohn choir; Chorale, "Awake," and Choral Finale, "Meistersinger," Wagner, Mendelssohn choir and Theodore Thomas orchestra.

Heinrich Gebhard, the Boston pianist, appears with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the matinee rehearsal of Friday, March 1, and at the evening concert of Saturday, March 2. The program chosen by Mr. Fiedler for these concerts is as follows:

Beethoven, overture, "Egmont;" Brahms, symphony in D-major, No. 2; Liszt, concerto in A-major for [illegible] and orchestra; Berlioz, overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Miss Katharine Goodson will be the soloist at the sixth symphony concert in Cambridge in Sanders theater, Thursday evening, Feb. 29. She will play the Saint-Saens concerto for piano and orchestra in G-minor, No. 2. The program is as follows: Weber, overture, "Euryanthe;" Schumann, symphony in C-major, No. 2; Saint-Saens, concerto in G-minor, No. 2; Wagner, prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde."

The second concert in aid of the pen-

Soprano Who Assists at Choral and Orchestral Concert in Symphony Hall

(Photo by Mishkin Studio, New York)
MISS FLORENCE HINKLE

sion fund of the Symphony orchestra takes place in Symphony hall Sunday evening, March 3. The soloist is Miss Elena Gerhardt, the German song interpreter.

* * *

The principal musical announcement of the coming week is the concert in Symphony hall Thursday evening by the Mendelssohn choir of Toronto and the Theodore Thomas orchestra of Chicago. These two organizations are giving three concerts in the East, two in New York on Tuesday and Wednesday nights, and the concert in Boston on Thursday evening. The Mendelssohn choir is said to have a large surplus from concerts given in Toronto and surrounding cities in the last few years. To bring 225 singers and an orchestra of 80 to New York and Boston is an under-

JOURNAL-

MARCH 4, 1912

CONCERT IN AID OF PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Program Attracts Large Audience.

Max Fiedler conducted his sixth and final Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert at Symphony Hall last night. He made up an exceedingly attractive program, including such sterling Tschaikowsky works as the "Pathetic Symphony," which had not been heard here since the fifth concert of his first season; the light and delectable "Nutcracker Suite," which he introduced to Symphony patrons on Christmas eve, 1908, and the big "1812 Overture."

Miss Gerhardt Sings

To complete the excellent features there was Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German lieder singer, offering three of Wagner's songs with orchestra, "Stehe still," "Traeume" and "Schmerzen," and also a group of Schumann songs, with piano accompaniment played by Miss Paula Hegner.

The audience was large, and probably but for the bitter cold night it would have filled the hall, for the Tschaikowsky music is very popular here and Miss Gerhardt has made many admirers with her beautiful art. It was well worth going to this concert simply to hear her highly poetical interpretations of the "Treume" song.

Auditors Enthusiastic

The "Pathetic Symphony" was performed with all the virtuoso power for which the orchestra is famed, and the players were deservedly applauded until they rose to bow for themselves. Mr. Nagel's celesta solo in the "Nutcracker Suite" and the charming flute playing of Messrs. Marquarre, Brooke and Battles also received special compliments from the enthusiastic auditors. The orchestra acknowledged Miss Gerhardt's generous offer of her services with a huge wreath decorated with the German tricolor.

[154]

POST,
MARCH 4, 1912

LAST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Orchestra and Miss Gerhardt Share Triumphs

The last of this season's pension fund concerts was given at Symphony Hall last evening before an audience of good size, yet not so large as the merits of the night deserved, for the musical glories presented should have packed the house to the doors. The extraordinarily artistic and fascinating singing given for the occasion by Miss Elena Gerhardt alone, would have repaid anyone for journeying up to Massachusetts avenue. And there was much else for musical delight and inspiration.

Orchestrally, it was a Tschaikowsky night; Tschaikowsky in three moods, the hopeless, the gayly fantastic and the boisterously patriotic, which is to say that there were played the "Pathetique" symphony, the "Nutcracker" suite and the "1812" overture. In these three was enough of variety to prevent the sometimes cloying result of one man's style, and enough of splendor and beauty of playing to remain long in the memory.

Mr. Fiedler has won an especial reputation as an interpreter of Tschaikowsky's works. This he maintained at every point last evening. Save a trifling lack of elasticity in the bizarre 5-4 movement, the performance of the symphony was superb; while the grace, airiness and charm of the playing of the melodious "Nutcracker" music were beyond all praise.

Miss Gerhardt's fine poise, beautifully expressive voice and supremely artistic temperament made no less effect in Symphony Hall than in a smaller auditorium. She has personality enough for any place whatsoever. Her singing of the three Wagner songs with orchestra proved her as effective in the larger forms of song as in "lieder." Rarely has the "Traume" been given here with such poetic phrasing and exquisite sentiment. After the group of Schumann songs with pianoforte accompaniment, of which the great "Ich Grolle Nicht" was sung with most overwhelming effect—though all were beautifully done—Miss Gerhardt gave the Richard Strauss "Standchen" in perfect style. Truly, here is an artist from whom we should hear much more. A word is due Miss Paula Hegner for her sympathetic and finely played accompaniments.

At the end of the Wagner group Miss Gerhardt was presented with a gigantic laurel wreath tied with the German colors, a token of esteem from the orchestra.

gramistic creations. The solo work of the violins, flutes, and horns was of the highest order.

Enesco's "Rhapsody" is a bunch of barbaric melodies cleverly embellished by every device known to modern orchestral composition. The orchestra played it so brilliantly its lack of solid structure was for the moment forgotten.

Concertmaster Witek, the soloist of the afternoon, played the familiar Wieniawski Concerto so brilliantly that even those who have long admired his orchestral work were agreeably surprised. In the beautiful Romanza and the wild Hungarian Finale he surpassed himself and won the warm applause of both audience and fellow-musicians.

JULIA MURDOCK.

AMERICAN—

FEBRUARY 25, 1912.

GEBHARD AS SOLOIST.

Takes Olga Samaroff's Place at Symphony Concert.

Madame Olga Samaroff was to have been the soloist at the seventeenth rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra. Unfortunately Madame Samaroff was taken ill in Milwaukee a fortnight ago and has been compelled to cancel all her engagements for the remainder of the season. In her place Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has engaged as soloist Mr. Heinrich Gebhard of this city, who is one of the most admired of Boston pianists.

Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties on this program. It is as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont"
Brahms.....Symphony in M-Major, No. 2
Liszt..Concerto in A-Major for piano and orchestra
Berlioz.....Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"

ELENA GERHARDT
PENSION FUND CONCERT

CHORAL MUSIC IN ITS FINEST FORM

Mendelssohn Choir to Give Its Much-Heralded Concert Here This Week.

The concert to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday evening by the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, assisted by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago and Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano, is promised to be a revelation to lovers of choral music in this city. All accounts agree that this chorus of 225 voices has, under the skilful and devoted training of Dr. A. S. Vogt, reached a point of virtuosity in singing the like of which can be found only in Berlin, where Siegfried Ochs has accomplished similar wonders with the Philharmonic Chorus of that city. Indeed, many connoisseurs who have heard both choruses are inclined to believe that in finesse and polish the Toronto choir excels the famous chorus of Berlin.

Some slight changes have been made in the published program. The program in its revised and final form is as follows:

Overture, "Liebesfruhling," op. 28, Georg Schumann
Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
a. Motet, "Cruxifixus".....Lotti
b. Motet, Psalm 121.....Gounod
Mendelssohn Choir.
c. "Judex Crederis," from "Te Deum"....Berlioz
Mendelssohn Choir ad Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
a. "Traume," a study to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
(Arranged for concert performance by Theodore Thomas.)
b. Bacchanale, from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
"Sanctus," from B-Minor Mass.....Bach
Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
Intermission.
a. "Ave Maris Stella".....Grieg
Mendelssohn Choir.
b. "Libera Me," from "Manzoni" requiem. Verdi
For soprano solo, chorus and orchestra.
Miss Florence Hinkle.
Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
Night Witchery.....Von Storch
Nottingham Hunt.....Bullard
Men's voices of the Mendelssohn Choir.
Symphonic Waltzz, op. 8.....Stock
Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
a. Scottish Folk-Song, arranged by Granville Bantock
b. "Hey Nonino," double chorus, op. 24.....Howard Brockway
Mendelssohn Choir.
c. Chorale, "Awake" and Choral Finale, "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

A FAMILIAR symphony, two familiar overtures and a rather unfamiliar pianoforte concerto will make the programme at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony is the second, and the most obviously and easily melodious of Brahms's symphonies, and it was played here only last December by Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra.

The two overtures are Beethoven's to Goethe's "Egmont"—one of Mr. Fiedler's "battle horses"—and Berlioz's to his opera "Benvenuto Cellini"—one of the orchestra's show-pieces. The concerto is Liszt's in A—the less known of the pair because it is less often played. It follows through iridescent veilings of ornament the life and adventures of a melody. Mr. Gebhard, long unheard at the Symphony Concerts and a ripening pianist, will play the solo part.

/ / + / /

Sanders Theatre: Symphony Concert

PIECES from the repertory and a pianoforte concerto that has not been played recently hereabouts fill the programme of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, on Thursday evening. The purely orchestral numbers are Schumann's symphony in C, in which Mr. Fiedler excels; the Prelude and the Finale of Wagner's "Tristan," and Weber's eloquent overture to his opera, "Euryanthe." The concerto is Saint-Saëns in G minor, beloved of Mr. Paderewski and grateful to pianist and hearer. Miss Goodson, the [illegible] vously direct, will play the solo part.

Gossip About Dr. Muck

The Lokal-Anzeiger of Berlin, in an article apropos of Dr. Muck's return to Boston, prints the following tale. It may or may not be true, but it is worth the reprinting: "There is no reason now why the facts need be concealed. A misunderstanding is responsible for Dr. Muck's departure. After the death of Felix Mottl, Muck was approached indirectly to succeed him at the Munich Opera, as a direct offer was not permissible under the rules of the Stage Association. In September of last year Muck definitely intended to renew his Berlin contract, which expired the following spring. In that month, while still on leave of absence, he received a formal offer of the position of chief conductor at the Munich Opera. His proud and sensitive nature, his artist's temper, at once hurried him to the conclusion that such an offer could only have been made on the basis of a previous understanding with the president of the Stage Association, Count von Hülsen, the director of the Berlin Opera. The implication to Dr. Muck's mind was that his contract at Berlin was not to be renewed. So with him, the artist, it was probably also a point of honor, to conclude his contract with the Americans, who for weeks had been coaxing him to do so.

"When at the end of summer Muck returned to Berlin, he realized at once that he had been under serious misapprehensions. None of the representatives of Count Hülsen had even suspected that Dr. Muck had signed an American contract. In the absence of the General Intendant, Privy Counsellor Winter brought a new contract to Dr. Muck for his signature, and now the conductor realized that he had acted on the basis of a mistaken notion of the facts. Neither in his capacity as General Intendant nor as president of the Stage Association had Count Hülsen had any connection with the Munich offer, which was intended to take effect at the end of Dr. Muck's term in Berlin. Count Hülsen was sadly surprised at Dr. Muck's decision, for he esteems him highly and tried in every way to keep him at the Opera House. Despite all efforts the consequences of the mistake could not be recalled, and a release from the five year American contract could not be effected."

TRANSCRIPT,
FEBRUARY 23, 1912

NEWS OF MUSIC

Miss Gerhardt and the Pension Fund

THE "distinguished singer," hitherto unannounced, who has proffered her services for the concert to increase the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra is Miss Gerhardt. Like most European virtuosi and singers of the first rank, she knows the great repute of the orchestra; she has heard it to admiration and she has sung with it to the applause of its public. It wa with the Symphony Orchestra that Mr. Nikisch first made his place as a remarkable conductor. Miss Gerhardt owes her beginnings as a singer to him. The more, then, is it becoming in her to give her services to the concert of March 3. There is no need to recite their value after her three song recitals and her two appearances with the Symphony Orchestra. Clearly she has proved herself one of the exceptional singers of our time, in songs and in the fragments of lyric operas; and she has quickly won and firmly held a fine public here. Her share in the Pension Fund Concert and Mr. Fiedler's orchestral programme still remain to be determined. At it, however, the conductor will make his final appearance in Boston, outside the regular Symphony Concerts.

Mr. Fiedler in New York

Mr. Fiedler and the gentlemen of Boston glorified Strauss's music [in "Death and Transfiguration"] and themselves. The noble peroration of the piece was reached in a subtly planned series of gradations and when it came, its tonal proclamation was nothing short of stupendous. The performance of this tone-poem was a demonstration of what the Boston orchestra can do at its best. [The New York Sun.

Miss Farrar Spectacular

That sedate band of harmony, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave their fourth evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night, and Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan, was the soloist. She was more than that, for she was really startling. She wore a gown that appeared to be a combination of crimson, turquoise blue, light blue and white, queerly slashed, gashed and cut. She wore a turban of gold and crimson, with flaring blue feathers in front. At times it looked like some Indian head-dress, at others, the effect was that of a modish godess of liberty. Waving a huge ostrich plume fan, Miss Farrar sang Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser." The whole combination of gown, turban, fan and prayer seemed incongruous. She sang it well, but with full voice and without much sentiment. It seemed an odd and unhappy number to have chosen. [The New York Herald.

TIMES
[illegible]
Washington, D.C.
FEB 21 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ENJOYED BY MUSIC LOVERS

Noted Organization Gives Varied Program at New National Theater.

An interesting but somewhat lengthy program was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Every one of the varied numbers was executed with perfect technical finish and with a warmth of feeling which Director Fiedler has been able to develop in an organization inclined to be overacademic in its interpretations.

Mozart and Schumann occupied the first part of the program, the former being represented by the "Figaro" overture, the latter by his Second Symphony. The "Figaro" overture is a monument to the genius of perhaps the only composer who could be light without once ceasing to be profound. Its delicate passages, with their joyful, but never boisterous, rhythm, were played in a manner which left nothing to be desired. While containing many noble passages, the Schumann symphony is not the composer's greatest work. Schumann was ever too much of a dreamer to be able to mold his orchestral works into that perfect subjection to a dominant idea which Beethoven has taught us to expect from the symphony. Like most post-Beethoven symphonies, this one of Schumann is very interesting in detail, but sadly deficient in synthesis.

Two modern works, Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and a rhapsody on native themes by George Enesco, a young Roumanian composer, completed the program. The Strauss number will always be popular because of its delightful unconventionality and the many serio-comic solo passages which it contains. "Till Eulenspiegel" is one of Strauss' earlier and saner works. As pure music it is immeasurably superior to his more recent and absurdly pro-

GERHARDT TO SING FOR PENSION FUND

Program for Next Sunday Night Concert by Symphony Orchestra Announced Later.

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday night. At the first concert early in the season the orchestra had the assistance of Madame Schumann-Heink and the concert was most successful from every point of view. For this concert a singer as distinguished in her line as Madame Schumann-Heink is in her, Elena Gerhardt, has generously offered her services, which offer has been gladly accepted by the committee in charge.

Few singers have come to Boston and in such a short time won so large a public as Miss Gerhardt. Heralded as one of the greatest lieder singers in the world it turned out that the reports which preceded her coming had not been exaggerated, for Miss Gerhardt in her recitals and at her appearance with the Symphony Orchestra exhibited traits and qualities of singing rarely found in the younger generation of artists.

It is still impossible to make final announcement regarding the program, for Mr. Fiedler has been away with the orchestra during the past week on the fourth Southern trip. This announcement, however, will be made very shortly.

For the general public—that part of it which is not in regular attendance at the Symphony concerts—this concert will gain added interest because it will be the last time a special concert will be given by the orchestra under the leadership of Max Fiedler. He has many friends and admirers in Boston who are not regular attendants at the Symphony concerts, and they will undoubtedly take advantage of this opportunity to testify to their friendship for him as well as their friendship for the orchestra.

GLOBE—M

MARCH 3, 1912.

Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert Tonight.

The last concert of the year in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this evening. Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer who has made so favorable an impression here this Winter, has kindly volunteered to give her services for this very worthy cause.

It will be the last opportunity to hear Miss Gerhardt in Boston this year, and she will sing two groups of songs, the first being three Wagner songs with orchestra, and the second being five Schumann songs with piano.

The Wagner songs are "Stehe Still," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The Schumann songs are "Provencalisches Lied," "Mondnacht," "Die Soldatenbraut," "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Fruhlingsnacht."

While Wagner, generally speaking, is the most potent name to draw the public to Symphony Hall, and as the last concert was devoted entirely to his works, Mr Fiedler decided to turn to something else this time and has chosen Tschaikowsky, who, in the favor of the public, runs Wagner a close second.

The three works to be played are the "Pathetic" Symphony, the charming "Nut-Cracker" suite, and the final number will be the "1812" overture, in which the great organ of Symphony Hall will be used.

Weingartner's Symphony at Boston Orchestra Concerts.

The novelty which Mr Fiedler places on the Symphony program to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is the most recent symphonic work from the pen of Felix Weingartner, his third Symphony in E major, Op. 49.

This work has been known as the "Viennese" Symphony because in the last movement the composer has used a number of strains from popular Strauss waltzes in contrapuntal effect with the principal themes. It had its first performance in Vienna in November, 1910, and a few weeks ago was played in New York by the Philharmonic Society of that city.

For the first time in several years, Maud Powell, the admired violinist, will appear as a soloist with the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Powell will play again Sibelius' D minor concerto, Op. 47. Miss Powell played this at her last appearance here, which was the first performance of the work in Boston, and made such a profound sensation that she was requested to play it again this year. The final number on the program will be S[illegible]tana's overture, "The Bartered Br[illegible]

[155]

POST,
MARCH 4, 1912

LAST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Orchestra and Miss Gerhardt Share Triumphs

The last of this season's pension fund concerts was given at Symphony Hall last evening before an audience of good size, yet not so large as the merits of the night deserved, for the musical glories presented should have packed the house to the doors. The extraordinarily artistic and fascinating singing given for the occasion by Miss Elena Gerhardt alone, would have repaid anyone for journeying up to Massachusetts avenue. And there was much else for musical delight and inspiration.

Orchestrally, it was a Tschaikowsky night; Tschaikowsky in three moods, the hopeless, the gayly fantastic and the boisterously patriotic, which is to say that there were played the "Pathetique" symphony, the "Nutcracker" suite and the "1812" overture. In these three was enough of variety to prevent the sometimes cloying result of one man's style, and enough of splendor and beauty of playing to remain long in the memory.

Mr. Fiedler has won an especial reputation as an interpreter of Tschaikowsky's works. This he maintained at every point last evening. Save a trifling lack of elasticity in the bizarre 5-4 movement, the performance of the symphony was superb, while the grace, airiness and charm of the playing of the melodious "Nutcracker" music were beyond all praise.

Miss Gerhardt's fine poise, beautifully expressive voice and supremely artistic temperament made no less effect in Symphony Hall than in a smaller auditorium. She has personality enough for any place whatsoever. Her singing of the three Wagner songs with orchestra proved her as effective in the larger forms of song as in "lieder." Rarely has the "Traume" been given here with such poetic phrasing and exquisite sentiment. After the group of Schumann songs with pianoforte accompaniment, of which the great "Ich Grolle Night" was sung with most overwhelming effect—though all were beautifully done—Miss Gerhardt gave the Richard Strauss "Standchen" in perfect style. Truly, here is an artist from whom we should hear much more. A word is due Miss Paula Hegner for her sympathetic and finely played accompaniments.

At the end of the Wagner group Miss Gerhardt was presented with a gigantic laurel wreath tied with the German colors, a token of esteem from the orchestra.

gramistic creations. The solo work of the violins, flutes, and horns was of the highest order.

Enesco's "Rhapsody" is a bunch of barbaric melodies cleverly embellished by every device known to modern orchestral composition. The orchestra played it so brilliantly its lack of solid structure was for the moment forgotten.

Concertmaster Witek, the soloist of the afternoon, played the familiar Wieniawski Concerto so brilliantly that even those who have long admired his orchestral work were agreeably surprised. In the beautiful Romanza and the wild Hungarian Finale he surpassed himself and won the warm applause of both audience and fellow-musicians.

JULIA MURDOCK.

AMERICAN—

FEBRUARY 25, 1912.

GEBHARD AS SOLOIST.

Takes Olga Samaroff's Place at Symphony Concert.

Madame Olga Samaroff was to have been the soloist at the seventeenth rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra. Unfortunately Madame Samaroff was taken ill in Milwaukee a fortnight ago and has been compelled to cancel all her engagements for the remainder of the season. In her place Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has engaged as soloist Mr. Heinrich Gebhard of this city, who is one of the most admired of Boston pianists.

Mr. Fiedler has placed no novelties on this program: It is as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont"
Brahms.....Symphony in M-Major, No. 2
Liszt..Concerto in A-Major for piano and orchestra
Berlioz.....Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"

ELENA GERHARDT
PENSION FUND CONCERT

TIMES

Washington, D.C.

FEB

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ENJOYED BY MUSIC LOVERS

Noted Organization Gives Varied Program at New National Theater.

An interesting but somewhat lengthy program was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Every one of the varied numbers was executed with perfect technical finish and with a warmth of feeling which Director Fiedler has been able to develop in an organization inclined to be overacademic in its interpretations.

Mozart and Schumann occupied the first part of the program, the former being represented by the "Figaro" overture, the latter by his Second Symphony. The "Figaro" overture is a monument to the genius of perhaps the only composer who could be light without once ceasing to be profound. Its delicate passages, with their joyful, but never boisterous, rhythm, were played in a manner which left nothing to be desired. While containing many noble passages, the Schumann symphony is not the composer's greatest work. Schumann was ever too much of a dreamer to be able to mold his orchestral works into that perfect subjection to a dominant idea which Beethoven has taught us to expect from the symphony. Like most post-Beethoven symphonies, this one of Schumann is very interesting in detail, but sadly deficient in synthesis.

Two modern works, Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and a rhapsody on native themes by George Enesco, a young Roumanian composer, completed the program. The Strauss number will always be popular because of its delightful unconventionality and the many serio-comic solo passages which it contains. "Till Eulenspiegel" is one of Strauss' earlier and saner works. As pure music it is immeasurably superior to his more recent and absurdly pro-

GERHARDT TO SING FOR PENSION FUND

Program for Next Sunday Night Concert by Symphony Orchestra Announced Later.

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday night. At the first concert early in the season the orchestra had the assistance of Madame Schumann-Heink and the concert was most successful from every point of view. For this concert a singer as distinguished in her line as Madame Schumann-Heink is in her, Elena Gerhardt, has generously offered her services, which offer has been gladly accepted by the committee in charge.

Few singers have come to Boston and in such a short time won so large a public as Miss Gerhardt. Heralded as one of the greatest lieder singers in the world it turned out that the reports which preceded her coming had not been exaggerated, for Miss Gerhardt in her recitals and at her appearance with the Symphony Orchestra exhibited traits and qualities of singing rarely found in the younger generation of artists.

It is still impossible to make final announcement regarding the program, for Mr. Fiedler has been away with the orchestra during the past week on the fourth Southern trip. This announcement, however, will be made very shortly.

For the general public—that part of it which is not in regular attendance at the Symphony concerts—this concert will gain added interest because it will be the last time a special concert will be given by the orchestra under the leadership of Max Fiedler. He has many friends and admirers in Boston who are not regular attendants at the Symphony concerts, and they will undoubtedly take advantage of this opportunity to testify to their friendship for him as well as their friendship for the orchestra.

CHORAL MUSIC IN ITS FINEST FORM

Mendelssohn Choir to Give Its Much-Heralded Concert Here This Week.

The concert to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday evening by the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, assisted by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago and Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano, is promised to be a revelation to lovers of choral music in this city. All accounts agree that this chorus of 225 voices had, under the skilful and devoted training of Dr. A. S. Vogt, reached a point of virtuosity in singing the like of which can be found only in Berlin, where Siegfried Ochs has accomplished similar wonders with the Philharmonic Chorus of that city. Indeed, many connoisseurs who have heard both choruses are inclined to believe that in finesse and polish the Toronto choir excels the famous chorus of Berlin.

Some slight changes have been made in the published program. The program in its revised and final form is as follows:

Overture, "Liebesfruhling," op. 28, Georg Schumann
Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
a. Motet, "Crucifixus".....Letti
b. Motet, Psalm 137.....Gounod
Mendelssohn Choir.
c. "Judex Crederis," from "Te Deum"....Berlioz
Mendelssohn Choir nd Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
a. "Traume," a study to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
(Arranged for concert performance by Theodore Thomas.)
b. Bacchanale, from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
"Sanctus," from B-Minor Mass.....Bach
Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
Intermission.
a. "Ave Maria Stella".....Grieg
Mendelssohn Choir.
b. "Libera Me," from "Manson!" requiem. Verdi
For soprano solo, chorus and orchestra,
Miss Florence Hinkle.
Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
Night Witchery.....Von Storch
Nottingham Hunt.....Bullard
Men's voices of the Mendelssohn Choir.
Symphonic Waltzz, op. 8.....Stock
Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
a. Scottish Folk-Song, arranged by Granville Bantock
b. "Hey Nonino," double chorus, op. 24.....Howard Brockway
Mendelssohn Choir.
c. Chorale, "Awake" and Choral Finale, "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Mendelssohn Choir and Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

A FAMILIAR symphony, two familiar overtures and a rather unfamiliar pianoforte concerto will make the programme at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony is the second, and the most obviously and easily melodious of Brahms's symphonies, and it was played here only last December by Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra. The two overtures are Beethoven's to Goethe's "Egmont"—one of Mr. Fiedler's "battle horses"—and Berlioz's to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini"—one of the orchestra's show-pieces. The concerto is Liszt's in A—the less known of the pair because it is less often played. It follows through iridescent veilings of ornament the life and adventures of a melody. Mr. Gebhard, long unheard at the Symphony Concerts and a ripening pianist, will play the solo part.

/ / + / /

Sanders Theatre: Symphony Concert

PIECES from the repertory and a pianoforte concerto that has not been played recently hereabouts fill the programme of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, on Thursday evening. The purely orchestral numbers are Schumann's symphony in C, in which Mr. Fiedler excels; the Prelude and the Finale of Wagner's "Tristan," and Weber's eloquent overture to his opera, "Euryanthe." The concerto is Saint-Saëns in G minor, beloved of Mr. Paderewski and grateful to pianist and hearer. Miss Goodson, the [illegible] nervously direct, will play the solo part.

Gossip About Dr. Muck

The Lokal-Anzeiger of Berlin, in an article apropos of Dr. Muck's return to Boston, prints the following tale. It may or may not be true; but it is worth the reprinting: "There is no reason now why the facts need be concealed. A misunderstanding is responsible for Dr. Muck's departure. After the death of Felix Mottl, Muck was approached indirectly to succeed him at the Munich Opera, as a direct offer was not permissible under the rules of the Stage Association. In September of last year Muck definitely intended to renew his Berlin contract, which expired the following spring. In that month, while still on leave of absence, he received a formal offer of the position of chief conductor at the Munich Opera. His proud and sensitive nature, his artist's temper, at once hurried him to the conclusion that such an offer could only have been made on the basis of a previous understanding with the president of the Stage Association, Count von Hülsen, the director of the Berlin Opera. The implication to Dr. Muck's mind was that his contract at Berlin was not to be renewed. So with him, the artist, it was probably also a point of honor, to conclude his contract with the Americans, who for weeks had been coaxing him to do so.

"When at the end of summer Muck returned to Berlin, he realized at once that he had been under serious misapprehensions. None of the representatives of Count Hülsen had even suspected that Dr. Muck had signed an American contract. In the absence of the General Intendant, Privy Counsellor Winter brought a new contract to Dr. Muck for his signature, and now the conductor realized that he had acted on the basis of a mistaken notion of the facts. Neither in his capacity as General Intendant nor as president of the Stage Association had Count Hülsen had any connection with the Munich offer, which was intended to take effect at the end of Dr. Muck's term in Berlin. Count Hülsen was sadly surprised at Dr. Muck's decision, for he esteems him highly and tried in every way to keep him at the Opera House. Despite all efforts the consequences of the mistake could not be recalled, and a release from the five year American contract could not be effected."

TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 23, 1912

NEWS OF MUSIC

Miss Gerhardt and the Pension Fund

THE "distinguished singer," hitherto unannounced, who has proffered her services for the concert to increase the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra is Miss Gerhardt. Like most European virtuosi and singers of the first rank, she knows the great repute of the orchestra; she has heard it to admiration and she has sung with it to the applause of its public. It wa with the Symphony Orchestra that Mr. Nikisch first made his place as a remarkable conductor. Miss Gerhardt owes her beginnings as a singer to him. The more, then, is it becoming in her to give her services to the concert of March 3. There is no need to recite their value after her three song recitals and her two appearances with the Symphony Orchestra. Clearly she has proved herself one of the exceptional singers of our time, in songs and in the fragments of lyric operas; and she has quickly won and firmly held a fine public here. Her share in the Pension Fund Concert and Mr. Fiedler's orchestral programme still remain to be determined. At it, however, the conductor will make his final appearance in Boston, outside the regular Symphony Concerts.

Mr. Fiedler in New York

Mr. Fiedler and the gentlemen of Boston glorified Strauss's music [in "Death and Transfiguration"] and themselves. The noble peroration of the piece was reached in a subtly planned series of gradations and when it came, its tonal proclamation was nothing short of stupendous. The performance of this tone-poem was a demonstration of what the Boston orchestra can do at its best. [The New York Sun.

Miss Farrar Spectacular

That sedate band of harmony, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave their fourth evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night, and Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan, was the soloist. She was more than that, for she was really startling. She wore a gown that appeared to be a combination of crimson, turquoise blue, light blue and white, queerly slashed, gashed and cut. She wore a turban of gold and crimson, with flaring blue feathers in front. At times it looked like some Indian head-dress, at others, the effect was that of a modish godess of liberty. Waving a huge ostrich plume fan, Miss Farrar sang Elisabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser." The whole combination of gown, turban, fan and prayer seemed incongruous. She sang it well, but with full voice and without much sentiment. It seemed an odd and unhappy number to have chosen. [The New York Herald.

GLOBE—M

MARCH 3, 1912.

Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert Tonight.

The last concert of the year in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this evening. Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer who has made so favorable an impression here this Winter, has kindly volunteered to give her services for this very worthy cause.

It will be the last opportunity to hear Miss Gerhardt in Boston this year, and she will sing two groups of songs, the first being three Wagner songs with orchestra, and the second being five Schumann songs with piano.

The Wagner songs are "Stehe Still," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The Schumann songs are "Provencalisches Lied," "Mondnacht," "Die Soldatenbraut," "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Fruhlingsnacht."

While Wagner, generally speaking, is the most potent name to draw the public to Symphony Hall, and as the last concert was devoted entirely to his works, Mr Fiedler decided to turn to something else this time and has chosen Tschaikowsky, who, in the favor of the public, runs Wagner a close second.

The three works to be played are the "Pathetic" Symphony, the charming "Nut-Cracker" suite, and the final number will be the "1812" overture, in which the great organ of Symphony Hall will be used.

Weingartner's Symphony at Boston Orchestra Concerts.

The novelty which Mr Fiedler places on the Symphony program to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is the most recent symphonic work from the pen of Felix Weingartner, his third Symphony in E major, Op. 49.

This work has been known as the "Viennese" Symphony because in the last movement the composer has used a number of strains from popular Strauss waltzes in contrapuntal effect with the principal themes. It had its first performance in Vienna in November, 1910, and a few weeks ago was played in New York by the Philharmonic Society of that city.

For the first time in several years, Maud Powell, the admired violinist, will appear as a soloist with the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Powell will play again Sibelius' D minor concerto, Op. 47. Miss Powell played this at her last appearance here, which was the first performance of the work in Boston, and made such a profound sensation that she was requested to play it again this year. The final number on the program will be Sm[illegible]tana's overture, "The Bartered Bri[illegible]

[155]

POST, MARCH 3, 1912

Composer's Tribute to Symphony Orchestra

Apropos of the Symphony pension fund concert this evening, Mrs. Henry Carmichael of Malden, authoress, composer, philanthropist, has written the following tribute to the great orchestra which has made Boston known wherever music is played:

A TRIBUTE

In a song of praise in words the voices of many people will join with mine in appreciation of all who educate and elevate the world through genius and industry. We need the artists of the serene and silent art. All the professions, all arts and crafts, the powerful press and beautiful music. All are influential in the highest education of the people. This tribute goes out to all these. It goes out to all schools of music, of instrumental music and song, to all musicians foreign, and American brothers and sisters in all lines of music. Among the relief associations which have been thought of for the betterment of humanity, the concert each year for the relief association for sick and disabled musicians in order to render timely aid, and the semi-annual concerts for the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be widely and sympathetically encouraged by a large patronage of all these concerts mentioned.

Pension Funds Abroad

Foreign nations have striven ardently for the welfare of the pension funds of their orchestras. The noble scheme has been tried abroad with great success in Germany, England, France, Austria, Switzerland, Holland and other lands for 50 years or longer. Everywhere it has been adopted to provide for support of aged and disabled orchestral musicians, it has been a success. In Europe, every educated person considers the support of the orchestra's pension adds to the success of the highest education of the people, and he makes it a matter of duty and honor to help it in various ways. For instance, the pension fund of the Leipsig Gewandhaus Orchestra and the Berlin Royal Orchestra are each in possession of funds amounting to 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 marks, and there are many others not far behind these mentioned in the matter of large funds.

Work for Interests

In Berlin, for example, the highest pension is 3200 marks, or $800, guaranteed, and as money is of greater value in Europe than it is here, these $800 are equivalent to $1500 here in Boston. The people abroad work for the interests of their orchestras. At a pension fund performance of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Hamburg, Germany, a number of leading women took the affair in hand and gave the performance of a comic opera by Strauss. All the solo parts were given by the Hamburg society. Eighty thousand marks, or $20,000, were the net receipts for the fund on this one evening, and this was no exception, but the rule over there. In Frankfurt on the Main the same was done with a fine result of 40,000 marks. In Leipsig, Berlin, Dresden, Hanover and other places the people pay very often a three-fold to a 10-fold price for a ticket, with the laudable desire to help increase the fund. The new Tonkunstler Orchestra in Munich started its pension fund three years ago, and is already in possession of two million marks. The people in Europe not only show interest in being present at the orchestra's pension fund concert, but they go much farther, they get up entertainments for it and are able to add to the fund's large receipts. Individuals make generous gifts in aid of the pension funds in foreign countries.

The Pension Fund

In recounting the triumphs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its magnificent organization and brilliant conductorship, too little credit has been given by writers to the excellence and artistry of the individual members. The musical world has been ransacked to secure perfect masters of their respective instruments, and upon the uniform expertness of its individual members the unsurpassed reputation of this orchestra largely depends.

A musician retires from this orchestra at a certain age. The training and temperament of a musician are not such as to fit him for a business employment after has spent a strenuous, exacting life in an orchestral calling, and the need has long been felt for a consistent and sufficient pension fund. While various suggestions have been made for increasing the fund no arrangements have yet been made for doing so, excepting the two pension fund concerts. The suggestion of providing a pension for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the outcome of the careful forethought of one of the conductors who came twice to this country to be the leader of this orchestra. It was Wilhelm Gericke's idea. The fund has largely been kept alive by his semi-annual concerts and the sums paid by the musicians of the orchestra in annual dues.

Some 20 musicians are now being pai pensions out of the sum. A sum of $5000 was early contributed by Mr. Higginson, who appreciated the importance of the fund. It is hoped that the semi-annual pension fund concerts will be a grand success and that large receipts will come from them, as the fund needs strengthening by a large patronage. The cause is such a noble one that many philanthropic people will probably make gifts to it and give entertainments for it, as is being done in Europe. A sufficient fund is a powerful inducement in securing the finest talent and a potent incentive to the best work of the musicians, who may look forward to some adequate support when from physical disability they are obliged to retire from active strenuous orchestral life.

It will be nine years this March since the pension fund was first started. At the present time some 20 pensions are being paid out of this amount. There have been a few kind friends who have given donations all the way from $5 to a $200 given them recently, and all favors of this kind from students, the well-to-do and the millionaires are equally aceptable when all give from the heart, the best they have to give in large or small offerings, their mites. A pension of $500 to a retiring member is not altogether sufficient for one who has given his services for from 25 to 28 years. It is not large enough to protect him or his family in need. Although some kind friends have given donations to the fund, much more must be done to put the fund on a sure basis and not far behind European organizations.

Thirty years ago the Symphony Orchestra was organized and eight years ago the pension fund for its musicians was started with the hope that such a grand object would never lack the support of the Boston public. In regard to some of the rules which govern the pension fund; musicians who remain longest in the orchestra are entitled to more consideration than those who leave after they have been in the orchestra for four or five years only. Those who remain 20 or 25 years have given their most valuable years to the orchestra and to the public.

Demands on Funds Great

If several are retired about the same time the demands upon the fund are great. It is necessary to have a large fund to meet all exigencies. If it is not on a solid foundation it cannot give the pension which musicians may reasonably expect after their long service in music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has for 30 years made Boston one of the leading centres of music in the world, and through its wonderful accomplishments has done its mission nobly for the musical education and refinement of artistic taste, and it holds up to the whole world a standard of musical perfection, and its performances can be compared only with those of the royal orchestras of Berlin, Dresden, Vienna and Paris. It is not surpassed by them. This orchestra is a part of Boston and the basis of its fame is founded on its perfection. There cannot be an educated man or woman in New England who does not take pride in this orchestra, no matter to what school of music, art or calling he may belong. At the start, foreigners who come here are affected by changes of country and climatic conditions. The fame of this orchestra is founded on the ideal work of the orchestral players, who are of every clime and country, including Americans.

Chamber Concerts

Aside from the demands of the orchestra upon their services, the musicians have been doing great work in the way of choice chamber concerts. Their professional services have been in demand for churches and cathedrals and as teachers in colleges, convents, music schools and homes, and as soloists in private musicales and salons. As teachers and interpreters, then, these musicians are needed here. Their range of work has been unlimited. Of all the data of interest which relate to their history, the most sublime one on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's book of records is the HUMANE CHAPTER—THE PENSION FUND.

* * * *

THE SPRING!

The spring is greening, the soft breeze sifts through the pine trees and whispers "hope," and of the coming of all things good and fair, and the springtime breathes of hopes realized by the musicians in this worthy and noble cause, and the sun smiles down on this page.

From AMERICAN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

Philharmonic Concert Tonight.

A program consisting of choruses composed for female voices, instrumental and vocal soli, will be presented at the concert to be given in the Academy Concert Hall this evening by the Woman's Philharmonic Chorus, assisted by a trio of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Corn Barker Janney, of this city, contralto, and Mlle. Else Busch, pianist. Joseph Pache, founder and director of the chorus, will conduct, and the men from the Symphony who will assist are W. Kraft, violinist; A. Hadley, cellist, and M. Hess, French horn player. Mrs. Janney's chief solo will be Von Fielitz's Fair Jessie.

HERALD, MARCH 4, 1912.

CONCERT FOR SYMPHONY FUND

Orchestra Entertainment Is Assisted by Miss Elena Gerhardt.

Symphony Hall was well filled last night at the concert in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra. The orchestral selections of the evening were chosen from the works of Tschaikowsky and three of his best known compositions were given in the usual excellent manner of this famed band of musicians.

The opening number was the symphony in B minor, "Pathetic." The four movements were given with great power and spirit, the finale being notable for its melodic strength. Mr. Fiedler conducted with careful appreciation of nuances.

Miss Elena Gerhardt, who gave her services, was the soloist and sang in her ever delightful manner. Her first appearance was in three songs of Wagner, "Stehe Still," "Traume" and "Schmerzen," to the accompaniment of the full orchestra. She was in excellent voice and sang with wondrous sweetness and purity of tone. She was presented with a huge wreath of laurel, a yard in the diameter, by the orchestra in appreciation of her aid in their concert.

The second selection by the orchestra was the suite from the ballet "Nutcracker." Its peculiar, even fantastic, music was skilfully played and was one of the most delightful members of the program. The sudden and startling changes in the varieties of dance music were keenly appreciated by the audience, whose spontaneous applause carried a note of mirth with it. The players of the bells, flutes and harp were compelled to rise as their turns came, in answer to the demand of their lectures.

Miss Gerhardt's second appearance was in a group of songs of Schumann, "Provencalisches Lied," "Mondnacht," "Die Soldatentraut," "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Fruhlingsnacht," with Miss Paula Hegner at the piano.

The concluding number was the overture "1812," by the orchestra with the organ, played with force and full martial effect.

HERALD,

MARCH 3, 1912.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The last concert of the year in aid o the Pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this evening at 8 o'clock. Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer, has kindly volunteered to giv her services to this very worthy cause It will be the last opportunity to hea Miss Gerhardt in Boston this year.

While Wagner, generally speaking, the most potent name to draw the pu lic to Symphony Hall, as the last c cert was devoted entirely to his wo Mr. Fiedler decided to turn to ano composer and has chosen Tschaikow who in the favor of the public Wagner a close second. In the overture the great organ of Symp Hall will be used. The program i proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B minor, No. 6.. "Pathetic ..... Tschaik y
Songs with orchestra:
(a) Stehe Still ..... W er
(b) Traeume ..... W er
(c) Schmerzen ..... W er
Suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the Ballet "Nut-Cracker" Tschaikowsky Songs with piano:
(a) Provencalisches Lied ..... Schumann
(b) Mondnacht ..... Schumann
(d) Die Soldatenbraut ..... Schumann
(d) Ich grolle nicht ..... Schumann
(e) Fruehlings nacht ..... Schumann
Overture, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky

18TH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The novelty which Mr. Fiedler places on the 18th Symphony program, to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, is the most recent symphonic work from the pen of Felix Weingartner, his third symphony in E major, op. 49. This work has been known as the "Viennese" symphony, becau in the last movement the composer h used a number of strains from popul Strauss waltzes in contrapuntal eff with the principal themes. It had first performance in Vienna in Nove ber, 1910, and it has been played in N York by the Philharmonic Society that city.

For the first time in several ye Maud Powell, the admired violinist, w pear as soloist with the Symph chestra. Miss Powell will play ag belius's D-minor concerto, op. 47. M well played this at her last appe ce here. It was the first performa the work in Boston and the conce ade such a profound sensation t e was requested to play it again ar. The final number on the prog ll be Smetana's overture, "The ide."

Before the Concert

The anticipation of the work of an internationally great orchestra is not greater than the realization but it is a sort of nebulous prelude to the concert and in its negative fashion harbors unspeakable delights for the lover of music.

It is a joy to go early to the theatre where the Boston Symphony plays and experience the luxury of steeping oneself in that intangible thing called "atmosphere." The stage is "set" for the orchestra which means that it is unadorned. There are no sops to the artistic in stage appointments, for a Symphony concert. None is necessary. It is the ear and not the eye which is to be satisfied.

And yet it requires only a little imagination, looking at that stage through half closed eyes, the windows which allow the wireless messages to the brain, to convert that stage into the attic studio of choice musical spirits of rare genius. The paneled "ceiling" slopes roof fashion and from either end depend lights shaded with dull brown hoods and put on at such angles as to be Bohemian in effect to the point of carelessness. The rows of plain, ugly, uncompromising chairs seem to take on lines of beauty when it is realized that they will soon be occupied with wizards of music. Gradually the sounds which have been coming from the mysterious region of the wings grow less for the musicians begin to stroll onto the stage.

The harpist comes first. Apparently he neither knows nor cares that the house is filling rapidly with beautifully gowned women and smartly groomed men. He sits down to his beloved instrument and strums the strings. He plays nothing and yet he may, to an inner consciousness be playing something. All the tones are melodious and stir the imagination of the listener who cannot quite divorce himself from the romantic element which clusters about the very name of the harp. The violinist is limbering his fingers and satisfying a fastidious desire for perfection by repetitions of a catchy phrase. The second violin section begins to fill up and soon all stringed instruments are emitting snatches of something or nothing. The flute begins to chirrup and the bassoon's delicious drone is heard. The oboe's inimitable reedy voice chimes in and soon the rich, mellow brasses give sonority to this strange sound chorus. All the instruments are speaking the same language but there are different dialects. It eventually becomes like the hum of gigantic insects, a harmonious conglomeration of sounds which paves the way for the wonderful differentiation and classification in the concert.

The musicians are like trained athletes anxious for the word to start them on their conquest of difficulties. The concert meister takes his place and there is a visible stiffening of the backbones of the audience for his appearance betokens the near a proach of the Director. The appea ance of Fiedler is the signal for a plause spontaneous and sincere. Th musical public has come to admir this virile conductor who, thoug completely divorced from the impressionistic style is never devoid of sentiment and gives a dash and color to his interpretations which invariably make his reading of a score unique and interesting.

He accepts the plaudits of the crowded house modestly but in a matter of fact sort of way. He has matters of great import on his mind and self sinks into the background as he takes the baton. Max Fiedler impresses one as possessing tremendous dynamic force. He does not pose. He has no mannerisms, but he does remind one of a human wind mill. His arms describe circles. His

From HERALD

Address New York

Date FEB 25 1912

"BRAVO!" INTERRU BOSTON SYMPHO

Artistic Interpretation of Schum Number Starts Applause Before Final Notes Are Played.

Boston made music filled Carnegie Hall again yesterday at the fourth matine concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A large audience gave much applause, especially in the case of the Schumann C major symphony. Here, figuratively speaking, the orchestra was artistically "on its toes," playing with finesse and beauty of tone that have rarely been equalled. One man even shouted "Bravo!" at the top of his lungs before the notes of the scherzo had died away, and at the close of the symphony the whole audience expressed its pleasure in applause so prolonged that the conductor and the players had to bow their thanks repeatedly.

Some of the glory was taken off the afternoon's work, however, by the performance of Mr. Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." Mr. Max Fielder, conductor, put this merry joke of Mr. Strauss' on the table and proceeded to dissect it with his baton until there was little spirit and less humor left in it. Nor did the orchestra distinguish itself in the playing of the capricious work, since some of the solo instruments slipped from grace and pitch at the same time.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist. He played Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" agreeably, but not faultlessly, Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, spiritedly played, ended the concert.

From TI ES

Address New York

Date FEB 25 1912

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Alwin Schroeder Warmly Greeted Soloist — Schumann, Strauss, and Wagner Played.

At the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday Mr. Alwin Schroeder appeared as soloist before an audience that greeted him, warmly as an old, well-beloved, much-admired friend, and left him in no doubt as to the esteem in which he is held in New York. He played Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" for violoncello with accompaniment of orchestra, and played it with all the command of tone, style and technique that are so well remembered here. It was the playing of a master, and was so recognized. Mr. Schroeder was repeatedly recalled to the platform to show his acknowledgments. It is a pity that solo players of the violoncello are so hard put to it for pieces to play in public. There are certain variations in this set that are beautiful and expressive, after the nature of the instrument. There are many others, those in which the composer felt called upon to let the player show the possibilities of a highly developed technique, that can by no stretch of meaning be called beautiful; that are, indeed, most unpleasant to the ear; and that even Mr. Schroeder could not make otherwise.

The orchestral numbers that preceded and followed Mr. Schroeder's appearance were Schumann's C major symphony, its greatest achievement in symphonic writing: Strauss's "rondo," "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the overture to Wagner's opera, "The Flying Dutchman." The symphony was played with superb spirit, and especially the adagio, one of the most supremely beautiful poetical utterances that ever came from the romantic school of composers, with a real expression of its fervor and ecstacy. And as for Strauss's incredibly diabolically clever "Till Eulenspiegel," it has perhaps never been presented here with more of its ribaldry, its riotous imagination, its wit and suppleness, set forth with so much dash and brilliancy of technique. It was an achievement on the part of both Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra.

From EVE. WORLD

Address New York City

Date FEB 29

GERALDINE FARRAR SINGS WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Once at the Metropolitan Opera House Geraldine Farrar was cast for Elizabeth in "Tannhauser." She presented then an impersonation of great intensity, ness and simplicity long to be remembered. Last night, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she sang Elisabeth's prayer in the same voice, without any tenderness or fervor of spirit. It might have been a statue ant Brunnhilde that she was impersonating instead of a despairing, pleading woman.

Her costume and her waving huge fan of ostrich feathers were enemies to conviction. But the American soprano, under all circumstances and conditions, seems to her public safe, for she was applauded. Later she sang three

Mr. Fiedler led his incomparable through Beethoven's fourth symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody" and Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration." In each composition his players gave of their best, the Strauss work being played brilliantly and the Enesco number proving a delight.

[156]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING JOURNAL,

Address New York City.

Date FEB 26 1912

Seventh Symphony of Beethoven Not Played This Season

By IRVING WEIL.

The present season of orchestral activity is a good deal more than half over and none of our conductors, resident or visitant, has yet seen fit to give his attention and ours to the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

Mr. Stransky, of the Philharmonic Orchestra, introduced himself to us with a not inspiriting performance of the Eighth Symphony, and Mr. Damrosch, of the New York Symphony Orchestra, has given us the Fourth and the Fifth and the Sixth. Is is not time that some one began thinking of giving the Seventh? Is a season to be permitted to by without a hearing of this wondrous thing in music?

Max Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been paying us its fourth monthly visit, is always alive to the fact that his beloved Richard Strauss, whom he interprets so well, is on his programmes. On Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall he and the orchestra delivered themselves of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Franks," which merrily lead Till to the gallows, and on the Thursday before there was the "Death and Transfiguration." Will Mr. Fiedler let that be sufficient Strauss and consider the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven as an offering upon his next and last visit here next month?

It would not be quite just to say that the Boston Orchestra plays Strauss better than it does anything else, but perhaps Mr. Fiedler's energies are more warmly at work in this music—who could put heart into it?—than in anything else. The "Till Eulenspiegel" was superlatively well played, but it needed only the "Flying Dutchman" overture that followed to set Strauss's wholly mental literary music in its place.

Happily Mr. Fiedler chose also the Schumann symphony in C major, else one would have had to rest content with a consideration of mere orchestral virtuosoship. Tschaikowsky, at his nearest to emptiness, the Variations on a Rococo Theme for violincello and orchestra, followed Schumann and gave Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, the first 'cellist of the organization, an opportunity to exhibit his powers with his instrument.

AMERICAN

MARCH 3, 1912.

Weingartner's New Symphony Novelty of Next Concert.

The novelty which Mr. Fiedler places on the eighteenth Smphony program, to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, is the most recent symphonic work from the pen of Felix Weingartner, his third Symphony in E-Major, Op. 49. This work has been known as the "Viennese" symphony, because in the last movement the composer has used a number of strains from popular Strauss waltzes in contrapuntal effect with the principal themes.

For the first time in several years Maud Powell, the admired violinist, will appear as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra.

MISS GERHARDT TO SING.

Volunteers Services for the Pension Fund Concert.

The last concert of the year in aid of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this evening at 8 o'clock. Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German singer who has made so favorable an impression here this Winter, has kindly volunteered to give her services for this very worthy cause. It will be the last opportunity to hear Miss Gerhardt in Boston this year. She will sing two groups of songs, the first being three Wagner songs with orchestra and the second being five Schumann songs with piano. The Wagner songs are "Stehe Still," "Traume," and "Schmerzen." The Schumann songs are "Provencalisches Lied," "Mondnacht," "Die Soldatenbraut," "Ich grolle nicht" and "Fruhlingsnacht."

While Wagner, generally speaking, is the most potent name to draw the public to Symphony Hall and as the last concert was devoted entirely to his works, Mr. Fiedler decided to turn to something else this time and has chosen Tschaikowsky, who in the favor of the public runs Wagner a close second. The three works he will play are the "Pathetic" Symphony, the charming "Nut-Cracker" Suite and the final number will be the "1812" Overture, in which the great organ of Symphony Hall will be used.

From EVENING SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

FOURTH BOSTON CONCERT

Entire Program Tonight Devoted To Tschaikowsky's Works.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will take place in the Lyric Theatre tonight, beginning at 8.15. The program will be devoted entirely to music by Tschaikowsky. It is as follows:

Elegie for strings from Serenade, Op. 48, Symphony in D minor No. 6, "Pathetic." Suite, "Nutcracker," for full orchestra. Overture, "1812."

ADVERTISER

MARCH 4, 1912

PENSION FUND CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

PROGRAMME ONE OF UNUSUAL INTEREST

Magnificent Playing of Tschaikowsky Symphony a Feature—Miss Gerhardt a Brilliant Soloist.

Last evening in Symphony hall the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Max Fiedler conductor, gave the last concert for this season, in aid of the pension fund. Miss Elena Gerhardt was the soloist.

In musical circles the week just closed has been an extraordinary and memorable one from the viewpoint of perfection of ensemble. The concert by the Symphony orchestra last night was a fitting climax to the eventful week. The marvellous choral effects made by the Toronto choir, the unexcelled playing of the Flonzaley quartette are the features which made the week one of unusual interest. After hearing the performance of the Beethoven quartette by the Flonzaleys, the singing of Lotti's "Crucifixus" by the Mendelssohn choir and the magnificent playing of Tschaikowsky's Symphony by our own orchestra last night it seems not too much to say that the limit of human achievement in musical interpretation had been reached. Verily, of late the music lovers' cup of joy has been full and running over.

Musical anatomists have dissected the scores of Tschaikowsky and have found all sorts of psychological and physical anomalies reflected in his music. Whether or not the soul of the composer is laid bare in the products of his genius is open to question. One patent fact remains—his music leaves one in a healthy and wholesome state of mind. At least, this was the case after hearing his sixth symphony last night. If, as we are told, this work reflects the melancholy of the man, it seems to be the passing mood of an essentially healthy mind and not the vagaries of a morbid one.

Mr. Fiedler gave a spirited and effective reading of the score and aroused splendid enthusiasm. The beautiful and plaintive theme in the first movement was played with a glowing warmth of tone. Widely differing in character, the four movements, with their great wealth of orchestral coloring and harmonic richness, were played superbly.

There was great charm and finish in the playing of the characteristic dances from the familiar "Nutcracker" suite, and great brilliancy marked the "1812" Overture.

By reason of her rare artistry, superb voice and muscianship, Miss Gerhardt has won many admirers in this city. Her appearance again last night deepened the fine impression she has already made in song recitals and in her previous work with this orchestra. In the intimacy of the smaller concert room and in the more formal atmosphere of the larger auditorium Miss Gerhardt is equally effective. In the songs of Wagner last night her voice was intensely emotional. She unerringly presented the subtle shades of poetical and musical meaning with appropriate tonal coloring. Where broad phrasing and full-voiced dramatic utterance were required she adequately met the demands of the music. Wagner's songs are comparatively little-known. For the most part they are difficult to make effective; but when sung as Miss Gerhardt sings them, this fact is not apparent. Of the three songs, "Traeume" was the best liked. Especially fine was her sustained unwavering legato and intense mezza voce in this number. Her singing of it was a splendid effort.

In the more familiar group of Schumann songs the audience warmed to Miss Gerhardt's singing of them. Her warm, thrilling voice was especially pleasing in "Fruehlingsnacht." The quiet intensity and equisite purity of tone in "Mondnacht" revealed new beauties in this song. In regard to fine vocalism and all it implies, Miss Gerhardt is one of a few singers we have heard in recent years who is entitled to rank with the great queens of songs. Miss Paula Hegner ably accompanied Miss Gerhardt.

Altogether it was an extremely interesting concert. The audience was large, enthusiastic, and generous with applause.

E. M. W.

From STANDARD UNION

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date FEB 23 1912

MUSICAL NOTES.

To-night brings the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Miss Bessie Bell Collier, the distinguished American violinist. The programme is as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream;" Frank, Symphony in D-Minor; Saint-Saens, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in B-Minor, No. 3; Tschaikowsky, Overture, "1812;" soloist, Miss Bessie Bell Collier.

TRAVELER

MARCH 1, 1912.

FAMOUS SINGERS CAPTURE AUDIENCE

Mendelssohn Choir Reveals Vocal Artistry Scarcely Deemed Possible.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, A. S. Vogt, conductor, and the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, Frederick Stock, conductor, gave a joint concert in Symphony Hall last evening. Miss Florence Hinkle had the solo part in Verdi's requiem. The accompanists were Mrs. W. J. A. Carnahan and Miss Ada F. Twohy.

The audience was prepared for something pretty fine, so famous has the reputation of this great vocal body become, but it could scarcely have been prepared for the really remarkable results obtained. Perfection almost seems lame when applied to the truly artistic singing of this choir. Boston has some good choral bodies and has in its time heard choral singing that seemed to challenge comparison, but not until last night has it fully realized the great possibilities of this branch of music. Such singing has never been heard here before and not likely to for years to come unless, indeed, this choir returns, for such perfection is not the work of one year or two, or of any ordinary collection of voices.

Mr. Vogt has a most remarkable body of singers, practically perfectly trained in every detail, even the minutest, with the result that the listener becomes so enraptured he is almost forced to rub his eyes to make sure that he is really listening to human voices. In all branches of the vocal art the choir displays an excellence that is beyond words to describe.

Never is true singing lost sight of, be it in the softest of passages, where even a whispered note would seem loud, to where the greatest strength is demanded. Amid such excellence individual numbers hardly call for comment, yet the unaccompanied singing, the artistic results in Lotti's "Crucifixus," Grieg's "Ave, Maris Stella" and the Bach "Sanctus" will long be treasured memories.

The orchestral work was fine. Boston has before now taken this body of players into its favor and last night's playing increased its regard. The audience filled the hall to the doors and was most enthusiastic.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date

FARRAR'S GOWN AMAZES CARNEGIE HALL AUDIENCE.

In Green-Yellow-Red-White Dress and Turban She Sings "Elizabeth's Prayer."

Beethovn's fourth symphony and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," were the two works of importance that the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Carnegie Hall at last night's concert before one of the largest audiences of the year. These compositions were interpreted with a beauty of tone, finish, breadth of style and unity of superlative order.

The real color of the night, however, was that having no relation to the music, and it was supplied by Geraldine Farrar, the soloist, in the costume she wore. The mingling of green, yellow, red and white of her elaborate gown; the utilization of some of these colors in the close fitting turban that almost covered the singer's ears produced a startling effect.

Miss Farrar's plumage was akin to that of a bird of paradise, and as she chose "Elizabeth's Prayer" for her opening number, it was inappropriate. So, too, was her singing of the air, which was devoid of the devout spirit and altogether too plentiful in tone.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From RECORD

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date FEB 20 1912

Musicians at Reception.

The Musical Art Society last night after the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held a reception at the clubhouse, Seventeenth and Chestnut streets, in honor of Max Fiedler, the leader of the orchestra; Anton Witek, the concertmeister and soloist of the evening, and of other members of the organization. Daniel Maquarre, first flutist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the principal oboeist of the Boston contingent, Lingy, were also guests of honor. Fiedler made a short address, congratulating the club upon its beautiful home, and there was supper for all the guests and for the members.

Established 1885

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... PHILADELPHIA, PA. FEB 2 ... 1912

Address .....

Date .....

GIVE RECEPTION TO MAX FIEDLER

Musical Art Club Members Are Hosts of Noted Conductor of Boston Symphony

NOTED MUSICIANS THERE

Musical Philadelphia last night participated mother of the series of enjoyable affairs which the Musical Art Club has been holding this season in its clubhouse, 1301 South Seventeenth street.

A throng of people of note in the musical world and social world of the city gathered at the reception tendered by the club to Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following the concert of the Orchestra at the Academy of Music. The handsomely appointed club house, which occupies two houses at the southwest corner of Seventeenth and Chestnut streets, was filled from the time the reception started at 10 o'clock until after mignight.

There were present as guests of honor, besides Mr. Fiedler, several of the principal members of the Orchestra, including Karl Wittek, concertmeister of the Orchestra and soloist of the evening's concert. He was accompanied by Mrs. Wittek. Mr. Lingy, the Boston Symphony's noted oboe artist; Daniel Maquarre, first flutist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, were also guests of honor.

Mr. Fiedler, in a short speech, expressed himself as being very much pleased with the reception. He paid high tribute to the musical appreciation he had found in Philadelphia during his visits here with the Boston Symphony, and regretted that it was to be his last season in America. He congratulated the musicians and music lovers of Philadelphia upon having such an attractive and comfortable clubhouse, where they could meet to dine and indulge in their favorite games, as well as for social intercourse.

Supper was served in the big banquet room of the club. The menu arranged by the club setward consisted of stewed snapper, fried oysters, chicken salad, sandwiches and coffee.

GLOBE

MARCH 4, 1912.

ENSION CONCERT.

na Gerhardt Appears as Soloist.

schaikowsky Program Played by the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max iedler conductor, gave a concert in aid f the pension fund last night. Miss lena Gerhardt, the eminent singer of ieder, contributed her services as the oloist of the evening. With the orchestra she sang Wagner's "Stehe Still," Traeume and Schmerzen," and with iano, these songs by Schumann: "Proencalisches Lied," "Mondnacht," "Die oldatenbraut," "Ich Gralle Nicht" and Fruehlingsnacht."

The singer was greatly enjoyed for er rich and varied accomplishments n the interpretation of song. Her oice is not inherently of great power, ut she employs it with uncommon inelligence, a fine discretion and a sinere and admirable art. As few other ingers in concert or opera, she senses ppreciatively and is able to impart itally the emotional content of a song. he was particularly successful in the ufetly rhapsodic Mondnacht, for it is n the lyric vein rather than in the heoic that she succeeds best. As an ncore to the second group Miss Gerardt added the Strauss Serenade. Miss Paula Hegner again accompanied xquisitely. One is not often privileged o hear the Fruehlingsnacht arise from he piano as a flower exhales the frarance of Spring.

The orchestral program was wholly rom Tschaikowsky, the sixth "Pahetic" symphony, the "Nutcracker" uite and the overture, "1812." There as an audience of good size and corial applause for players, conductor nd Miss Gerhardt. For the singer here was also the customary wreath f laurel.

FEB 25 1912

...TERRUPTS SYMPHONY

...tion of Schumann Applause Before Are Played.

...filled Carnegie Hall the fourth matinee of the Boston Symphony large audience gave ...cially in the case of ...or symphony. Here, ... the orchestra was ...toes," playing with ...tone that have rarely ...man even shouted ...of his lungs before ...erzo had died away, ... the symphony the ...essed its pleasure in ...d that the conductor ... to bow their thanks.

...was taken off the ...owever, by the per...chard Strauss' "Till ...ax Fielder, conduc...rry joke of Mr. ...and proceeded to dis...until there was little ... left in it. Nor did ...ish itself in the play... work, since some of ... slipped from grace ...e time.

...r, first 'cellist of the ... soloist. He played ...iations on a Rococo ...but not faultlessly. ...utchman" overture, ...ed the concert.

...w York

FEB 25 1912

...TON ORCHESTRA.

...er Warmly Greeted as ...chumann, Strauss, ...agner Played.

...on concert of the Boston ...stra yesterday Mr. Alwin ...red as soloist before an ...rested him warmly as an ... much-admired friend, ... doubt as to the esteem ... held in New York. He ...wsky's "Variations on a ... for violoncello, with ac... orchestra, and played it ...mand of tone, style, and ...are so well remembered ... playing of a master, and ...ed. Mr. Schroeder was ...led to the platform to ...kledgments. It is a pity ... of the violoncello are so ... pieces to play in public. ...in variations in this set ...ul and expressive, after ...e instrument. There are ...se in which the composer ...o let the player show the ... highly developed tech...y no stretch of meaning ...ul; that are, indeed, al... to the ear; and these ...ler could not make other...

... numbers that preceded ... Schroeder's appearance ... C major symphony, his ...mont in symphonic writ...rondo." "Till Eulenspie...ks," and the overture to ... "The Flying Dutch...phony was played with ...d especially the adagio, ...supremely beautiful and ...s that ever came from ...hool of composers, with ...on of its fervor and ... for Strauss's incredibly ... "Till Eulenspiegel," it ...er been presented here ...s ribaldry, its riotous ... wit and suggestiveness ...o much dash and brilliance. It was an achieve... of both Mr. Fiedler and

...D

New York City.

FEB 23 1...

...E FARRAR SOLOIST ...BOSTON ORCHESTRA ...Metropolitan Opera Hous... ...arrar was cast for Elisa... ...nnhauser." She presented ...ersonation of girlish devo... ...mplicity long to be remem... ...night, as soloist with ... ...hony Orchestra, she sang ... ...rayer in fine voice, ...tenderness or devotion ...ght have been a triumph ...e that she was repeated... ...-a despairing, dying swan, ...e and her waving of a ...ostrich feathers, too, were ...onviction. But the popular ...prano, under all circum... ...conditions, seems to hold ...afe, for she was heartily ...later she sang three songs, ...ied his incomparable ... ...hoven's fourth symphony ...ture to "The Marriage of ...esco's "Roumanian Rhap... ...auss's tone poem, "Death ...uration." In each of ...ayers gave of their ... ...work being perfect... ...nd the Enesco rhapsody ...night.

From AMERICAN
Address New York
Date

SYMPHONY RECITAL BY THE BOSTONIANS

Schumann and Strauss Dominant Features in Carnegie Hall Programme.

FIEDLER AS INTERPRETER

No Singer Breaks the Thread of the Instrumental Scheme.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Schumann and Strauss were the dominant features in the programme played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

No singer broke the thread of the instrumental scheme, which included, besides the admired No. 2 of Schumann (in C major) and the capricious "Till Eulenspiegel" music of Strauss, Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" for violoncello and orchestra, and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Alwyn Schroeder, of the Bostonian organization, was the soloist who performed the "Variations."

The symphony was played with much vivacity and warmth and charm. The shading of Mr. Fiedler seemed beautifully right and fitting, while the tonal coloring of the orchestra, more particularly in the second movement, left nothing to be desired.

Strauss had a good and earnest interpreter of his "Till Eulenspiegel" in Mr. Fiedler yesterday, though not perhaps one quite so closely in sympathy with his description of his mad rogue's "merry pranks" as the late Gustav Mahler.

But Mahler, who had something of Till Eulenspiegel in his inmost heart, was at his finest when he played the work of Strauss.

Another large and most attentive audience heard the concert.

"T[illegible]" at Metropolitan

From [illegible]
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 22 1912
Date

[illegible] portrays Nobody.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For four successive seasons music lovers of Hartford have had the benefit of perfect performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Max Fiedler. It is safe to say that in all the years the orchestra has been coming to this city no conductor has enjoyed such genuine favor and popularity as Mr. Fiedler and it is with much sincere regret that Hartford will bid farewell to him at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season in Parsons's theater next Monday evening.

Mr. Fiedler came to America in the fall of 1908 as the successor to Dr. Karl Muck and immediately won distinction by the skill with which he made enjoyable programs. His solid attainments as a musician and conductor were revealed during his first year here and the orchestra has never been so prosperous as during his tenure of office. At the end of the current season Mr. Fiedler's season closes and he returns to Germany where undoubtedly a valuable field will be found for his great talent.

The concert Monday evening should be particularly brilliant. As soloist the orchestra brings with it Kathleen Parlow, the extraordinary young Canadian violinist who has been one of the reigning sensations in music of this country for the past two seasons. Like Elman and Zimbalist, she is a pupil of the famous Leopold Auer of St. Petersburg and many of the traits of their playing are found in hers. At the same time, she is very frankly individualistic and can be counted among the few really great violinists of her time.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most attractive program, divided between Russians and Wagner. The first number will be the fascinating "Scheherazade" Symphonic Suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, a work which is fairly permeated with the richly colored oriental atmosphere of the Arabian Nights which inspired it. Miss Parlow will play Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, the work which was written for her teacher and originally dedicated to him but which he in the first place refused to play on account of its difficulty. The other works will be the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture. Seats at Gallup & Co.'s music st[illegible]

[illegible] Christ Church.

HERALD,
FEBRUARY 25, 1912.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The final appearance of Miss Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished Lieder singer, in Boston will be at the second concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening, March 3, at 8 o'clock. Miss Gerhardt has generously offered her services for this event and they have been gladly accepted by the committee in charge, who realize that her presence will add much to the attractiveness of the program.

For the general public—that part which does not attend regularly the

DR. A. S. VOGT,
Conductor Mendelssohn Choir.

Symphony concerts—this pension fund concert will gain added interest in that it will be in a sense a farewell appearance of Mr. Fiedler, for this is his final season in Boston, and as no other extra concerts are contemplated this pension fund will be the last one open to the general public. Mr. Fiedler, who has been away during the past week, has not yet announced his program, but this will be done early in the week.

The tickets for the concert are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

MENDELSSOHN CHOIR

The concert to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday evening, Feb. 29, by the Mendelssohn choir of Toronto, assisted by the Theodore Thomas orchestra of Chicago and Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano, will undoubtedly be a revelation to lovers of choral music. All accounts agree that this chorus of 225 voices has, under the skilful and devoted training of Dr. A. S. Vogt, reached a point of virtuosity in singing the like of which can be found only in Berlin, where Siegfried Ochs has accomplished similar wonders with the Philharmonic chorus of that city. Indeed, many connoisseurs who have heard both choruses are inclined to believe that in finesse the Toronto choir excels the chorus of Berlin.

The choir, with the Chicago orchestra, gives its first of the four out-of-town concerts in Buffalo on Monday evening. Then they give two concerts in New York. Although the prospects are that they will be greeted everywhere by "sold out" houses, the journey to the East is not made for gain, because the expense of bringing 225 singers and an orchestra of 75 so far is very large. However, the Toronto choir is in the enviable position of having a large surplus, the result of its successful concerts in Toronto and neighboring cities during the last few years, and the purpose of the trip East is not merely to show us how they sing, but to give the singers a reward for the long and tiring season of preparatory work.

The program in its revised form is as follows:

Overture, "Liebesfruehling," op. 28....Georg Schumann
Theodore Thomas Orchestra.
Motet, "Crucifixus".....Lotti
Motet, Psalm 137.....Gounod
Mendelssohn Choir.
"Judex Crederis" from "Te Deum".Berlioz
Choir and Orchestra.
"Traeume," a study to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
(Arranged for concert by Thomas).
Bacchanale, from "Tannhauser"..Wagner
Orchestra.
"Sanctus," from B-Minor Mass.....Bach
Choir and Orchestra.
Intermission.
"Ave Maris Stella".....Grieg
Choir.
"Libera Me," from "Manzoni" Requiem Verdi
Miss Florence Hinkle.
Choir and Orchestra.
Night Witchery.....Von Storch
Nottingham Hunt.....Bullard
Men's Voices of the Choir.
Symphonic Waltz, Op. 8.....Stock
Orchestra.
(a) Scottish Folk-Song, arranged by Bantock.
(b) "Hey Nonino," double chorus, Op. 24.....Brockway
(c) Chorale, "Awake," and Choral Finale, "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Choir and Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W[illegible]

From [illegible]
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
Date FEB 23 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert at Parsons's theater Monday evening marks the close of the Boston Symphony orchestra's series. The program offered will doubtless make it the most popular event of the season. This and the introduction of Kathleen Parlow as soloist, and the farewell appearance of Mr. Fiedler add unusual interest to the occasion. The sale of seats at Gallup & Co.'s music store is already so large that reservations cannot be held later than Saturday night. Gallery tickets may be purchased now at 201 Asylum street.

From EVENING MAIL
Address New York
Date

'CELLIST'S ART ADDS DIGNITY TO CONCERT

Alwin Schroeder, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as Soloist, Wins Unrestrained Applause for His Superb Performance of a Tschaikowsky Masterpiece.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

Alwin Schroeder, former cellist of the Kneisel Quartet, now a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the soloist at the matinee concert of the visiting orchestra and elicited eight or ten recalls after his superb performance of Tschaikowsky's Variations on a rococo theme. He lent much dignity to the programme given under Mr. Fiedler, who will only have one more appearance here.

This conductor has worked his way into the appreciation of the Boston Symphony audiences of New York, and his readings on Saturday in the Schumann symphony, "Till Eulenspiegel," by Richard Strauss, and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" caused a keen regret that, needing such a hand as much as we do in this country, we should not make a place for him permanently.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W[illegible]

From [illegible]
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 19 1912
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert at Parsons's theater Monday evening will mark the close of the famous Boston orchestra's most successful season in Hartford, and will also be the last appearance of Max Fiedler as conductor. Both orchestra and conductor have become popular with the Hartford musical public and many music lovers will regret Mr. Fiedler's departure from the post he has for three seasons so admirably filled. For this concert a program of brillian music will be presented, opening with a symphonic suite, "Scheherazadi," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and closing with three of Wagner's most popular and effective works for orchestra, preludes to "Meistersinger," "Lohengrin" and overture to "Tannhauser." Kathleen Parlow will play Tchaikawsky's violin concerto with the orchestra as the solo number. Seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

From EVE. WORLD
Address New York City.
Date FEB 6 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS STRAUSS BRILLIANTLY.

No such brilliant exposition of Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" as that by Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon has ever been heard here. Not even the most old-fashioned music lover, steeped in the tradition of Beethoven and frightened at the mere mention of the name of the modern iconoclast, could fail to recognize that. It was a marvel of virtuosity. As a young woman remarked to the writer: "Mr. Fiedler not only knows what he wants when he wants it, but he gets it." The response to his commanding beat by the band compelled unqualified admiration. What a supreme satisfaction it must be to Mr. Higginson that he has succeeded in bringing together such a superb aggregation of players!

Schumann's beautiful second symphony, in C major, was the opening number, played so exquisitely that one could not fail to regret that Mr. Fiedler is to take himself away from us at the end of the season. This without prejudice to Dr. Karl Muck, who is to be Mr. Fiedler's successor, for whom, as readers of this column know, the writer has profound admiration. That master 'cellist, Alwin Schroeder, was the soloist. He was heard in Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococco theme, which gave him a chance to display his admirable technique and to win the plaudits of the great audience that the Boston Symphony Orchestra now always commands. What a pity that there is such a paucity of literature for the 'cello that Mr. Schroeder could find no better vehicle for the display of his [illegible]

From EVENING GLOBE
Address New York
Date FEB 26 1912

Max Fiedler, whose days with the Boston Symphony Orchestra are drawing to a close, elected to make a great effect with music by Richard Strauss, his admiration for which is no secret, at his New York concerts last week. The magnificent "Tod und Verklärung" of Thursday night had a brilliant pendant in the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Saturday afternoon. The audience that thronged Carnegie Hall, as audiences have a way of doing at Boston Symphony concerts, would persuade one that even an opera house that has sternly banished Strauss cannot make New Yorkers forget that there is a second great Richard of music. The men from Boston on Saturday were also heard in Schumann's C major symphony and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The soloist was Alwin Schroeder, whose mastery of the 'cello was manifest in Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme."

From EVENING MAIL
Address New York
Date

[illegible] the orchestra was another.

MR. FIEDLER APPLAUDED.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth evening concert of the series at Carnegie Hall, and Mr. Fiedler was received with many efforts to show him the appreciation he has well deserved from the New York admirers of the great orchestra. The virtuosity of the Boston orchestra in the Strauss "Death and Apotheos's" was overwhelming. This reading, however, was not new, nor was the Mozart overture to the "Marriage of Figaro," nor the Beethoven fourth symphony, to which Mr. Fiedler brought some of his finest skill.

There was much interest in a new rhapsody by George Enesco, the Roumanian composer, who, taking the folk tunes of his own country, produced a singularly brilliant and admirably woven web of melody. The mastery of orchestral treatment, the brilliancy of effects and the sweep of the orchestra gave this work real charm, although it is of lighter value than some of the composer's earlier works that have been offered here.

MISS FARRAR SOLOIST.

Geraldine Farrar was the soloist, and perhaps this platform furnished the opportunity to note what improvement she has made in her singing. Songs by Sinding, Schumann and Grieg had real charm of interpretation as well as of voice, but one must always feel the incongruity of such offerings at a symphony concert, nor was the aria from "Tannhauser" more in place, as excerpts from familiar operas never are.

No accompaniments such as Arthur Rosenstein supplied should fail to have the name of the accompanist included.

His work was real art, too, such art as is not found often, and when found it is to be appreciated.

Many people were turned away last night from the Metropolitan, where "Aida" was sung by Mme. Destinn, Caruso, Mme. Matzenauer, Dinh Gilly, Miss Sparkes and others under the baton of Toscanini. The usual brilliancy attended the performance.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau COURANT

From [illegible]
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
FEB 23 1912
Date

Last Boston Symphony Concert.

The program of the third and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will commend itself to every patron. Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant symphonic suite, "Scheherazadi," was performed by this orchestra a number of years ago at Foot Guard Hall. The Tschaikawitz violin concerto was performed here for the first time by Mischa Elman two years since and is one of Kathleen Parlow's greatest successes. The rest of the program offers Wagner numbers already well known to Hartford's music-lovers, but nevertheless always welcomed. Max Fiedler's last appearance here with the orchestra will add to the interest of the occasion. A very large audience is already assured. The seat sale is at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

[158]

From STAATSZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date FEB 27 1912

gerte sich mit dem Stücke selbst. P.

Konzerte.

Das Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am Samstag Nachmittag war eines der genußreichsten der Saison. Herr Fiedler hat nicht häufig eine inspirirtere Leistung geboten als mit Schumann's Zweiter Symphonie, die er wie aus einem Guß und mit wundervoller Ausbreitung des Melos dirigirte. Sein Musterorchester folgte den Intentionen des Führers mit wundervoller Virtuosität und Durchgeistigung. Womöglich noch wirkungsvoller war die Ausführung, die die Bostoner Gäste Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel" angedeihen ließen. Ein Orchester, das aus lauter Virtuosen besteht. Man konnte neben der Brillanz aber auch eine Wiedergabe bewundern, die mit großen Linien arbeitet.

From CITIZENS

Address Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date FEB 3 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO-NIGHT.

Symphony Concert at Academy of Music.

To-night will bring the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Miss Bessie Bell Collier, the American violiniste. The programme is as follows: Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); Symphony in D minor (Franck); Concerto for violin and orchestra in B minor, No. 3 (Saint-Saens); overture, "1612" (Tschaikowsky).

From EVENING TELEGRAM

Address New York

Date

Miss Geraldine Farrar may be depended upon to lend excitement even to the staid atmosphere of a Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night she appeared with that impressive organization in Carnegie Hall wearing a gown that was truly symphonic, with three themes—red, white and blue—in honor of the national holiday, and as full of color as a Strauss tone poem.

One of these self-same tone poems was on Mr. Fiedler's programme. It was "Death and Transfiguration" and was played so well by the Boston players that the audience rose to unwonted heights of applause.

A Mozart overture, a Beethoven symphony—the fourth—and a Wagner aria sung by Miss Farrar led the progressive programme toward a group of modern songs, and a most delightfully melodic Roumanian Rhapsody by the contemporary Enesco.

It was a remarkable holiday programme, but the only American features of it were the colors of Miss Farrar's gowns. She sang Elisabeth's prayer from Tannhäuser, with the orchestra accompanying, in a manner that seemed more dramatic than devotional. Her other songs were exquisitely sung, to the capable piano accompaniment of Rosenstein.

ADVERTISER,

FEBRUARY 20, 19

MUSIC NOTES.

The second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony will be given in Symphony hall on Sunday, March 3. A distinguished soloist will be announced later in the week.

From HERALD,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date

Mrs. Taft occupied a box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon, when she had with her Mrs. Stimson, wife of the Secretary of War; Mrs. Nagel, wife of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and Mrs. Hale, wife of former Senator Hale, of Maine.

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date FEB 23 1912

Tonight brings the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Miss Bessie Bell Collier, the distinguished American violinist. The programme is as follows:

Overture—"A Midsummernight's Dream." Mendelssohn

Symphony in D minor.....Franck

Concerto for violin and orchestra in D minor, No. 3.....Saint-Saens

Overture—"1812".....Tschaikowsky

Soloist, Miss Bessie Bell Collier.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date FEB 25

Boston Symphony Concert.

The concert given by the Bostpn Symphony on Monday was another example of what perfection can be reached by an organization when everything possible and necessary is done to produce it. The years the orchestra has existed, always under the training of great masters, is, of course, the true secret of its success. The ensemble playing has the most wonderful qualities, consisting of a crispness and accuracy combined with bigness of tone, which is most unusual.

Mr. Fiedler is not an inspiring leader, but he is an unusual drill master, which tells materially. Mr. Witek's influence as concertmeister is very remarkable, and his work as a virtuoso in the Brahms Concerto is quite unique. He has been accorded the highest praise the world over for his interpretation of this work, and while you can find flaws in execution you feel that he is the master, and you must listen.

The concerts given by our own orchestra were most interesting, showing a different spirit and an improvement in every way. It must be that Mr. Pohlig wishes to please his many patrons, and while he has been tardy in realizing his faults, it is never too late to mend, and it is evident that the criticism he was subjected to has rudely awakened him. It might have been as efficacious had the criticism been sent privately and not through the press. However, we are sure all are willing to wait and see what will be the result of his awakening before making the criticism final.

GLOBE-

FEBRUARY 20, 1912.

The second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday evening, March 3. A distinguished soloist will be announced later in the week. The tickets go on sale next Friday morning.

EVENING SUN,

From

Address New York City.

Date MAR 9 19

In order that the Boston Symphony's star men may also appear in the popular price chamber concerts at Cooper Union, there will be two concerts only two days apart in the series there next week. The People's Symphony Quartet on Tuesday plays selections from Bazzini, Smetana and Arens, with Verdi's "Caro Nome" and Handel's "Sweet Bird" sung by Beatrice Bowman.

On Thursday night, the Maquarre Sextet comes from Boston in a programme from Bach, Rameau and Gouvy, and Estelle Liebling sings the gavotte from Massenet's "Manon" and Delibes's bell song from "Lakmé."

EVENING JOURNAL,

From

Address New York City.

Date MAR 9 - 1912

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall on March 21 and 23, Max Fiedler will bid farewell to New York. At the first concert he will play the Brahms C minor symphony and at the second, Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica."

EVENING NEWS

From

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

PLAN PROGRAM FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Max Fiedler Carefully Selecting Numbers For Season's Last Concert.

Conductor Max Fiedler of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is taking care with the program for the fifth and last concert of the season, which will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 20. This will be his farewell appearance in Baltimore, and he wishes to make the occasion as brilliant as possible. He will have the assistance as soloist of Madame Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is to sing two numbers—Lia's narrative from Debussy's prize cantata, "The Prodigal Son," and Liszt's great song with orchestra, "The Loreley."

From CITIZENS

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date MAR 9 - 1912

Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is taking especial care with the programme for the fifth and last concert of the season, which will be given in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, March 22. This will be his farewell appearance in Brooklyn, and he wishes to make the occasion as brilliant as possible. He will have the assistance as soloist of Madame Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is to sing two numbers—Lia's narrative from Debussy's prize cantata, "The Prodigal Son," and Liszt's great song with orchestra, "Die Lorelei." The full programme will be announced early next week.

From EVENING SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Louise Homer Will Be Soloist At Lyric March 20.

Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is taking especial care with the program for the fifth and last concert of the season, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, March 20. He will have the assistance as soloist of Mme. Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is to sing two numbers—Lia's narrative from Debussy's prize cantata, "The Prodigal Son," and Liszt's great song, with orchestra, "The Loreley."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address New York

Date MAR 1 - 1912

D-Dur-Symphonie.

Das letzte Konzertpaar des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Carnegie Hall findet am Abend des 21. resp. Nachmittags des 23. d. Mts. statt. Die Solistin am 21. März ist Frau Luise Homer; Herr Fiedler dirigirt bei dieser Gelegenheit Brahms' Erste Symphonie. Am Nachmittag des 23. März nimmt Herr Fiedler in einem ausschließlich orchestrale Musik bringenden Konzert vom New Yorker Publikum Abschied. Richard Strauß' „Symphonia Domestica" wird die Hauptnummer sein.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date MAR 10 1912

The closing concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, March 22. This also will be the farewell appearance here of Conductor Max Fiedler at the head of the orchestra, for at the end of the current season his present engagement expires. No conductor of the orchestra has had more friends and admirers in the borough than this modest, unassuming musician, who has achieved brilliant results in the four years that he has been in Boston. The soloist March 22 will be Mme. Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York

Date 10 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

As already announced, Mrs. Louise Homer will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony evening concert, Thursday evening, March 21, in Carnegie Hall. The symphony beginning of 1883 while in Rome. Two letters written by the composer to his friend, N. F. von Meck, show just how he felt in regard to this trio, and nothing in all of his voluminous correspondence is more intimate and illuminating than his expressed attitude in regard to it. Just before the close of the year 1881 he wrote to Von Meck: "Do you know what I am composing just now? You will be very much astonished. Do you remember how you once advised me to compose a trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncell, and my reply, in which that night will be Brahms's in C minor (No. 1). On Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler will bid farewell to his new York audiences and for this occasion he has arranged a programme entirely of orchestral music. The clou of this will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica."

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date MAR 10 191

PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY.

On Tuesday evening, at Cooper Union Hall, the fourth concert of chamber music arranged by the admirable People's Symphony Club, will take place with the co-operation of Beatrice Bowman, soprano, and of Pauline Mallet-Prevost, pianist. Miss Mallet-Prevost is a daughter of the president of the club. A second concert will be given on Thursday evening, with the assistance of picked members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Maguarre Sextet.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 10 1912

Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is taken especial care with the program for the fifth and last concert of the season which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18. This will be his farewell appearance in Philadelphia and he wishes to make the occasion as brilliant as possible. He will have the assistance as soloist of Madame Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is to sing two numbers, "Lia's" narrative from Debussy's prize cantata, "The Prodigal Son," and Liszt's great song, with orchestra, "The Loreley."

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 10 1912

Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is taking especial care with the program for the fifth and last concert of the season, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18. This will be his farewell appearance in Philadelphia and he wishes to make the occasion as brilliant as possible. He will have the assistance as soloist of Madame Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is to sing two numbers, Lia's narrative from Debussy's prize cantata, "The Prodigal Son" and Liszt's great song with orches-

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 10 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Washington concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 19. It promises to make Conductor Max Fiedler's farewell in this city notable in more respects than one. With Mme. Louise Homer as soloist, he is going to devote the entire program to Wagner. Mme. Homer is to sing two numbers, the Waltraute Narrative from "Gotterdammerung" and Adriano's great aria from "Rienzi." Although it is not finally settled, the orchestral selections will probably be the preludes to "Die Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and the "Tannhauser" overture. This program is subject to slight change.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

Date MAR 10 191

Mme. Homer Soloist.

As already announced Madame Louise Homer will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony evening concert on Thursday, March 21, in Carnegie Hall. The symphony on that night will be Brahms' in C Minor, No. 1. On Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler will bid farewell to his New York audiences and for this occasion he has arranged a programme entirely orchestral. The clou of this will be Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

From PRESS

Address New York

Date MAR 10 191

Homer with Boston Orchestra.

As already announced, Louise Homer will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony evening concert on Thursday, March 21, in Carnegie Hall. The symphony on that night will be Brahms's in C minor, No. 1. On Saturday afternoon Fiedler will bid farewell to his New York audiences and for that occasion has arranged a programme entirely orchestral, including Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica."

From EAGLE

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date MAR 1 0 1912

The Maquarre sextet, a Boston organization, composed of the first instruments of the Boston Symphony, at the concert of March 14, at Cooper Union, will play, the chronological feature being by Miss Estelle Liebling, in a group of Italian arias. She was formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The programme:

Bach—Suite, B minor (flute and strings); Massenet—Gavotte, "Manon Lescaut" (1842); Rameau—Petite Suite, B flat; Delibes—Indian Bell Song, "Lakme"; Gouvy—Serenade, Opus 82 (flute and strings).

From EAGLE

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date MAR 1 0 1912

Conductor Max Fiedler of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is taking especial care with the programme for the fifth and last concert of the season which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 22. This is to be his farewell appearance in Brooklyn and he wishes to make the occasion as brilliant as possible. He will have the assistance of Mme. Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who as soloist, is to sing Lia's narrative from Debussy's prize cantata, "The Prodigal Son", and Liszt's great song with orchestra "Die Lorelei." The full programme will soon be announced.

From STANDARD UNION

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date MAR 1 0 1912

Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston symphony Orchestra, is taking especial care with the programme for the fifth and last concert of the season which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 22. This will be his farewell appearance in Brooklyn and he wishes to make the occasion as brilliant as possible. He will have the assistance as soloist of Madame Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is to sing two numbers, Lia's narrative from Debussy's prize cantata, "The Prodigal Son," and Liszt's great song with orchestra, "Die Lorelei."

From STANDARD UNION

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date MAR 1 0 1912

The Maquarre Sextet is a Boston Organization, composed of the first instruments of the Boston Symphony. They are being brought here from Boston expressly for the concert of March 14, so that the members may have the advantage, educationally, of hearing sextet arrangements, as well as trios and quartets. The chronological feature will be given by Miss Estelle Liebling, in a group of Italian arias, representative of the period to which they belong. This soloist was formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The programme for March 14 will be as follows:

Suite, B minor (flute and strings).....Bach
Gavotte, "Manon Lescaut" (1842)..Massenet
Petite Suite, B flat.....Rameau
a) La Pantomime
b) L 'Indiscrete
c) Le Rameau
Indian Bell Song, "Lakme".....Delibes
(Bell obligato.)
Serenade. Op. 82.....Gouvy (Flute and strings.))

From HERALD BROOKLYN EDIT

New York

Address

Date MAR 1 0 191

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Bostor Symphony Orchestra, is taking specia care with the programme for the fifth and last concert of the season, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 22. This will be his farewell appearance in Brooklyn, and he wishes to make the occasion as brilliant as possible. He will have the assistance as soloist, of Mme. Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is to sing two numbers—Lia's narrative from Debussy's prize cantata, "The Prodigal Son," and Liszt's great song with orchestra, "Die Lorelei."

The full programme will be announced next week.

From WORLD

New York

Address

Date MAR 1 0 1912

Mme. Louise Homer will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony evening concert on Thursday, March 21, in Carnegie Hall. The symphony that night will be Brahms's in C minor, No. 1. On Saturday afternoon Conductor Fiedler will bid farewell to his New York audiences, and for this occasion he has arranged a programme entirely of orchestral music. The chief number of this will be Richard Strauss's Symphonia Domestica.

From EVENING GLOBE

New York

Address

Date MAR 16 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last New York concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will also mark the last appearances here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, a post he has held for the last four years. On Thursday night the soloist will be Mrs. Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company. On Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist.

From EVENING JOURNAL,

New York City.

Address

Date MAR 16 191

The last visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York for this season and the farewell of Conductor Max Fiedler, will be with its pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the first concert, the chief number will be the Brahms C minor symphony, while Mme. Louise Homer will sing two selections. At the second concert, the principal item will be Strauss's "Domestic Symphony."

From CITIZENS

Brooklyn, N. Y. MAR 16 1912

Address

Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE ON FRIDAY NEXT

Its Last Brooklyn Concert of the Season.

MME. HOMER THE SOLOIST

Charity Concert at Hippodrome To-Morrow Night—N. Y. Symphony Programme—Brahms Festival—Bachaus Recital March 22

The twenty-fifth consecutive season of concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end with the fifth and last concert of the present series to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 22. Incidentally this concert will mark the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for his engagement with the orchestra ends at the close of the present season in May, when he will return to Germany. Next year and for a term of years to follow the orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded four years ago.

The four years that Mr. Fiedler has been at the head of the orchestra have been memorable in many respects. His tireless energy and generous devotion have enabled the orchestra to widen its field and greatly to increase its season's work, and under his conductorship the orchestra has attained to the highest point of material prosperity. Nor is it going too far to say that no conductor has enjoyed a greater measure of popularity with the general public than Mr. Fiedler, and his departure from Boston will be viewed with regret by his many friends and admirers.

The programme which he has arranged for the last concert here is one of more than ordinary interest. In the first place the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the admired principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Homer will sing two numbers, the first Liszt's song with orchestra, "The Loreley," and the second Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to the opera "Der Freischuetz," Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora" No. 3.

From TIMES

Brooklyn, MAR 16 1912

Address

Date

The twenty-fifth consecutive season of concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end with the fifth and last concert of the present series to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 22. Incidentally this concert will mark the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for his engagement with the orchestra, ends at the close of the present season in May when he will return to Germany. Next year and for a term of years to follow the orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded four years ago. The four years that Mr. Fiedler has been at the head of the orchestra have been memorable in many respects. His tireless energy and generous devotion has enabled the orchestra to widen its field and greatly to increase its season's work and under his conductorship the orchestra has attained to the highest point of material prosperity. He has enjoyed a large measure of popularity with the general public, and his departure from Boston will be viewed with regret by many friends and admirers. The programme which he has arranged for the last concert here is one of more than ordinary interest. In the first place the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the admired mezzo soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Homer will sing two numbers, the first Liszt's song with orchestra "The Loreley," and the second Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata "The Prodigal Son."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Richard Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora" No. 3.

The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Symphonia Domestica.....Strauss
Song With orchestra, "The Loreley".....Liszt
"Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner
Lia's Recitative and air from "The Prodigal Son".....Debussy
Overture, "Leonora" No. 3.....Beethoven

From EVE. POST.

New York City.

Address

Date MAR 16 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will also mark the last appearances here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, which post he has held for the last four years. On Thursday night the soloist will be Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company. On Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist. Thursday's programme includes: Beethoven, Overture, "Lenore," No. 3; Brahms, Symphony in C-Minor, No. 1; Liszt, Song with orchestra, "The Loreley"; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Debussy, Lia's Aria from "The Prodigal Son"; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhäuser." Programme for Saturday afternoon: Weber, Overture to "Der Freischütz"; Strauss, "Symphonia Domestica"; Wagner, "Siegfried Idyll," Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung," Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

From EVENING MAIL

New York

Address

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season, and the final ones under the direction of Max Fiedler, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Thursday night the soloist will be Mme. Homer, who will sing Liszt's "Lorelei" and Lia's aria from "The Prodigal Son." The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's first symphony and two Wagner numbers.

There will be no soloist Saturday afternoon, and the principal orchestral number will be Strauss's Domestic symphony. There will be three Wagner numbers and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Philadelphia, Pa.

Address

Date MAR 16 1912

Musical Notes

WITH Louis Homer as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its final concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, the occasion also marking the last appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fielder, the director, who ends his engagement with the organization at the close of this season and returns to Germany. The program on Monday evening will include, as orchestral numbers, the overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischutz," the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. Mme. Homer will appear twice, singing "The Loreley," by Liszt, and Lia's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy.

From EVE. SUN

New York City.

Address

Date MAR 16 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, besides a Friday farewell in Brooklyn. These concerts will also mark the last appearances here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, which post he has held with success for the last four years. On Thursday night the soloist will be Louise Homer.

The programme for Thursday repeats two numbers in the rival Minneapolis list, Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" No. 3, and Brahms's symphony, No. 1. To these the Boston bill adds Liszt's song with orchestra, "The Loreley;" Wagner's preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser, and Debussy's aria from "The Prodigal Son."

Mr. Fiedler at his farewell on Saturday afternoon will conduct the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica," which he gave two years ago, and three Wagner numbers, the "Siegfried Idyl," funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" and prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

From EVENING STAR

Baltimore, Md.

Address

Date

MME LOUISE HOMER WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT LYRIC MAR 20.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Next Wednesday evening, March 20, will bring the last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Max Fiedler as conductor of that famous organization. Mr. Fiedler's engagement of four years ends with the close of the current season in May, when he will return to Germany, and his place next year will be taken by Dr. Karl Muck, whom he succeeded in the fall of 1908. Mr. Fiedler should leave America in every way satisfied with his career in this country.

From EVENING SUN

Baltimore, Md.

Address

Date

MAX FIELDER'S FAREWELL

Boston Orchestra's Final Concert Of Season Here Wednesday.

Next Wednesday evening will bring the last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also the farewell appearance in (Baltimore of Max Fiedler as conductor. Mr. Fiedler's engagement of four years ends with the close of the current season in May, when he will return to Germany, and his place next year will be taken by Dr. Karl Muck, whom he succeeded in the fall of 1908.

The soloist will be Mme Louise Homer, contralto. Mme. Homer will sing two numbers, the first being Liszt's great song, "The Loreley," and the second Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 2.....Beethoven
Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Song with orchestra, "The Loreley,".Liszt
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Lia's aria from "The Prodigal Son,"
Debussy
"Death and Transfiguration".....Strauss

[160]

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 1 6 1912

From EVENING NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 1 6 1912

LAST CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Wednesday's Appearance Of Max Fiedler To Be His Final One Here.

Next Wednesday evening, March 20, will bring the last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and also the farewell appearance in Baltimore of Max Fiedler as conductor of that famous organization. Mr. Fiedler's engagement of four years ends with the close of the current season in May, when he will return to Germany and his place next year will be taken by Dr. Karl Muck, whom he succeeded in the fall of 1908.

The last concert promises to be more than usually interesting. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the most admired of American contraltos and the principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. Madame Homer will sing two numbers, the first being Liszt's great song, "The Loreley," and the second Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." It was with this work that Debussy won the Prix de Rome and which first brought him to notice as a composer of uncommon talent, if not genius. To be sure, there is little in the work to remind one of the Debussy of today, the composer of "Pelleas et Melisande," "Iberia" and "Saint Sebastian," for "The Prodigal Son" is written more in the style of Massenet than in the style of the later Debussy. Within the last two or three years he retouched parts of it in order to prepare it for operatic performance in Boston, but this particular aria remains practically as he wrote it.

The orchestral selections will comprise Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3; Brahms' symphony in C minor, No. 1; the prelude to "Lohengrin," and finally Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Overture—"Leonora No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony in C minor, No 1.....Brahms
Song with orchestra, "The Loreley"
.....Liszt
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Lia's aria from "The Prodigal Son"
.....Debussy
"Death and Transfiguration".....Strauss

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From RECORD
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date MAR 17 1912

* * *

The twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end with the concert to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Incidentally this concert will mark the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Orchestra, as his engagement ends in May, when he returns to Germany. Next year and for a term of years to follow the Orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Fiedler succeeded four years ago. The four years that Fiedler has been at the head of the Orchestra have been memorable in many respects. His energy and devotion have enabled the Orchestra to widen its field and greatly to increase the season's work.

The program which he has arranged for this last concert is of interest. In the first place the soloist will be Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House. She will sing two numbers, the first Liszt's song, with orchestra, "The Loreley," the second Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata "The Prodigal Son." The orchestral numbers will comprise the Overture to "Der Freischuetz"; Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3.

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-seventh consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end with the fifth and last concert of the present series to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, March 18. Incidentally this concert will mark the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for, as is generally known, Mr. Fiedler's engagement with the orchestra ends at the close of the present season in May, when he returns to Germany. Next year and for a term of years to follow the orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded four years ago.

The four years that Mr. Fiedler has been at the head of the orchestra have been memorable in many respects. His tireless energy and generous devotion have enabled the orchestra to widen its field and greatly increase its season's work, and under his conductorship the orchestra has attained to the highest point of material prosperity. Nor is it going too far to say that no conductor has enjoyed a greater measure of popularity with the general public than Mr. Fiedler, and his departure from Boston will be viewed with regret by his many friends and admirers.

The program which he has arranged for this last concert is one of more than ordinary interest. In the first place, the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the admired principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Homer will sing two numbers, the first Liszt's song with orchestra, "The Loreley;" the second Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to "Der Freischutz," Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Weber—Overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz."
Strauss—Symphonia Domestica.
Liszt—Song with orchestra, "The Loreley."
Wagner—"Siegfried Idyl."
Debussy—Lia's aria, from "L'Enfant Prodigue."
Beethoven—Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1912

Boston Symphony Concert

The twenty-seventh consecutive series of concerts in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to a close with the interpretation of tomorrow evening's program to be offered by this organization in the Academy of Music under the leadership of Max Fiedler. The occasion will also signalize the farewell of Doctor Fiedler, who returns to Germany, making way in the conductorship of the orchestra for Dr. Karl Muck, who comes back to this post, formerly held by him, after an absence of several seasons.

The soloist will be Louise Homer, who will make her first appearance here this year. This richly gifted American contralto from the New York Metropolitan organization will be heard in Liszt's "The Loreley" and in an aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son." The other offerings will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," Strauss' "Sanfonia Domestica," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore No. 3."

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1912

The 27th consecutive season of concerts in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end with the fifth and last concert of the present series to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, March 18. Incidentally, this concert will mark the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Syhphony Orchestra, for, as is generally known, Mr. Fiedler's engagement with the orchestra ends at the close of the present season in May, when he returns to Germany. Next year and for a term of years to follow the orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded four years ago. The four years that Mr. Fiedler has been at the head of the orchestra have been memorable in many respects. His tireless energy and generous devotion have enabled the orchestra to widen its field and greatly increase its season's work, and under his directorship the orchestra has attained to the highest point of material prosperity. Nor is it going too far to say that no conductor has enjoyed a greater measure of popularity with the general public than Mr. Fiedler, and his departure will be viewed with regret by his many friends and admirers.

The programme which he has arranged for this last concert is one of more than ordinary interest. In the first place, the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the admired principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Homer will sing two numbers—the first, Liszt's song, with orchestra, "The Loreley"; the second, Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to "Der Freischutz," Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Weber, overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz."
Strauss, Symphonia Domestica.
Liszt, song, with orchestra, "The Loreley."
Wagner, "Siegfried Idyl."
Debussy, Lia's aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue."
Beethoven, overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

* * *

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 17 1912

The twenty-fifth consecutive season of concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra closes at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 22. Max Fiedler's engagement as conductor ends in May, when he will return to Germany. Next year, and for years to follow, the orchestra will have as conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded four years ago. The four years that Mr. Fiedler has been at the head of the orchestra have been memorable. His tireless energy and generous devotion has enabled the orchestra to widen its field and greatly to increase its season's work. Under his conductorship the orchestra has attained to the highest point of material prosperity. Moreover, no conductor has enjoyed a greater measure of popularity with the general public than has Mr. Fiedler; his departure from Boston will be viewed with regret. The programme arranged by him for the concert here is one of unusual interest, for the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the admired principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, who will sing two numbers, the first Liszt's song with orchestra, "The Loreley," and the second, Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Beethoven's Overture, "Leonora," No. 3. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber
"Symphonia Domestica".....Strauss
Song, with orchestra, "The Loreley"....Liszt
"Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner
Lia's Recitative and Air from "The Prodigal Son".....Debussy
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.....Beethoven

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address New York
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will also mark the last appearances here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, which post he has held for the last four years. On Thursday night the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company and the principal orchestral work will be Brahms' C Minor Symphony No. 1. On Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist and the principal orchestral work will be Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which the orchestra played here under Mr. Fiedler's direction almost exactly two years ago. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

From HERALD
Address New York
Date MAR 17 1912

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

THE twenty-fifth consecutive season of concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end with the fifth concert of the series to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening.

Incidentally this concert will mark the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, for his engagement with it ends in May, when he will return to Germany. Next season and for a term of years the orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Dr. Fiedler succeeded four year ago, ago.

The four years that Mr. Fiedler has been at the head of the orchestra have been memorable in many respects. His tireless energy and generous devotion have enabled the orchestra to widen its field and greatly to increase its work, and under his conductorship the orchestra has attained to the highest point of material prosperity. Nor is it going too far to say that no conductor has enjoyed a greater measure of popularity with the public than Dr. Fiedler, and his departure from Boston will be viewed with regret by his many friends and admirers.

The programme which he has arranged for the last concert is one of more than ordinary interest. The soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer, the admired principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Homer will sing two numbers, the first Liszt's song, with orchestra, "The Loreley," and the second Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to the opera "Der Freischütz," Richard Strauss' "Symphony Domestica," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 2.

From NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
Address New York
Date MAR 17 1912

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Die letzten diesjährigen Konzerte des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters finden am Abend des 21. und am Nachmittag des 23. März in Carnegie Hall statt. Herr Max Fiedler wird sich nach vierjähriger Thätigkeit vom New Yorker Publikum verabschieden. Die Solistin am Donnerstag Abend ist Frau Louise Homer, welche Liszt's „Lorelei" und eine Arie aus Debussy's „Der verlorene Sohn" vortragen wird. Herr Fiedler dirigirt am Donnerstag Brahms' Erste Symphonie, Beethoven's „Leonoren"-Ouverture, das Vorspiel zu „Lohengrin", die „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture. Das Programm für Samstag umfaßt die „Freischütz"-Ouverture, Strauß' „Symphonia Domestica", das „Siegfried-Idyll", den Trauermarsch aus der „Götterdämmerung" und „Vorspiel und Liebestod" aus „Tristan".

From WORLD
Address New York
Date

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will also mark the last appearances here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, which post he has held for the last four years. On Thursday night the soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and the principal orchestral work will be Brahms's C Minor Symphony No. 1. On Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist and the principal orchestral work will be Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, which the orchestra played here under Mr. Fiedler's direction nearly two years ago. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture, Leonora, No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony in C Minor No. 1.....Brahms
Song with Orchestra, "The Lorelei".....Brahms
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Liszt
Lia's Aria from "The Prodigal Son".....Wagner
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Debussy
The programme for Saturday afternoon is:
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Symphonia Domestica.....Strauss
"Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner
Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods."
Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner

[161]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BROOKLYN DAILY

From STANDARD UNION
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 17 1912

The twenty-fifth consecutive season of concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end with the fifth and last concert of the present series to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 22. Incidentally this concert will mark the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for his engagement with the orchestra ends at the close of the present season in May, when he will return to Germany. Next year, and for a term of years to follow, the orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded four years ago. The four years that Mr. Fiedler has been at the head of the orchestra have been memorable in many respects. His tireless energy and generous devotion has enabled the orchestra to widen its field and greatly to increase its season's work, and under his conductorship the orchestra has attained to the highest point of material prosperity. Nor is it going too far to say that no conductor has enjoyed a greater measure of popularity with the general public than Mr. Fiedler, and his departure from Boston will be viewed with regret by his many friends and admirers. The programme which he has arranged for the last concert here is one of more than ordinary interest. In the first place the soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the admired principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House. Madame Homer will sing two numbers, the first, Liszt's song with orchestra, "The Loreley," and the second, Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son." The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora" No. 3. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
"Symphonia Domestica" ..... Strauss
Song with orchestra "The Loreley" ..... Liszt
"Siegfried Idyl" ..... Wagner
Lia's recitative and air from "The Prodigal Son" ..... Debussy
Overture, "Leonora" No. 3 ..... Beethoven

Carl Fique will give the lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening next. The lecture recital is set in the lecture hall, Academy of Music, at 4 P. M., on Thursday, and will close the series, which is presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

From HERALD
Address New York
Date MAR 17 1912

A SECOND visiting orchestra will b the Boston Symphony, which wi give its final brace of concerts fo the season in Carnegie Hall on Thurs day night and Saturday afternoon. Spe cial interest is attached to the concer for Saturday as it will be the last ap pearance here of Mr. Max Fiedler, wh has been conductor of the organizatio for several years. He will be succeed ed next season by Dr. Carl Muck, wh was the head of the orchestra before him and had to put down his baton to fulfil his contract with the German Emperor and lead opera in the Royal Opera House, in Berlin. Dr. Muck's term in Berlin will end with the season and he will return to Boston for several years, while Mr. Fiedler will go back to Germany.

To return to Saturday's concert, there will be no soloist, and the orchestra will play Mr. Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," Weber's "Freischutz" overture and three Wagnerian excerpts. On Thursday night Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, of the Metropolitan, will be the soloist, singing Liszt's "Loreley" and Lia's aria from Mons. Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." The orchestral numbers include Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3, Brahm's First Symphony and two Wagnerian numbers.

From PRESS
Address New York
Date

Fiedler's Last Appearance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. They will mark the last appearances here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, which post he has held with so much success for the last four years. On Thursday night the soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and the principal orchestral work will be Brahms's C minor Symphony No. 1. On Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist, and the principal orchestral work will be Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which the orchestra played here under Fiedler's direction two years ago.

Here are the programmes:

Thursday—Beethoven, overture, "Leonora," No. 3; Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1; Liszt, song with orchestra, "The Loreley"; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin"; Debussy, Lia's aria from "The Prodigal Son"; Wagner, overture, "Tannhaeuser."

Saturday—Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz"; Strauss, "Symphonia Domestica"; Wagner, "Siegfried Idyl," funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung," and prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tris-

From AMERICAN
Address New York
Date MAR 17 1912

Max Fiedler Returns to Europe in May

Makes Last Appearance Here with Boston Orchestra on Friday Evening.

The twenty-fifth consecutive season of concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to an end with the fifth and last concert of the present series to be given in the Academy of Music, next Friday evening. Incidentally this concert will mark the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for his engagement ends at the close of the present season in May, when he will return to Germany.

Next season, and for a term of years to follow, the orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded four years ago.

The programme which Mr. Fiedler has arranged for the last concert here is one of more than ordinary interest. In the first place, the soloist will be Louise Homer, the principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Homer will sing two numbers, the first Liszt's song with orchestra, "The Loreley," and the second, Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora" No. 3.

From WORLD
Address New York
Date

Conductor Max Fiedler of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is taking special care with the programme for the fifth and last concert of the season, which will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. This will be his farewell appearance in Brooklyn, and he wishes to make the occasion as brilliant as possible. He will have the assistance as soloist of Mme. Louise Homer, principal contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is to sing two numbers—Lia's narrative from Debussy's prize cantata, "The Prodigal Son," and Liszt's great song with orchestra, "Die Lorelei."

From TRIBUNE
Address New York
Date MAR 17 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ends the most successful season it has ever had in New York with its two concerts which come on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23, respectively.

At all of the eight concerts given so far this winter every seat in the house has been sold, with hundreds of people turned away, and this will be true of the whole of the ten. These concerts gain in interest also, in that they will mark the last appearances here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Fiedler came to Boston in the fall of 1908 to take the place of Dr. Karl Muck, who the two years previously had been at the head of the orchestra. Now Mr. Fiedler's engagement is ending and next fall Dr. Muck returns for a term of years.

There will be a soloist at the Thursday evening concert—Mrs. Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company—but on Saturday afternoon the programme will be entirely orchestral. The feature of the Thursday evening programme will be Brahms's C minor symphony, while Richard Strauss's "Symphony Domestica" will be the most important work on the Saturday afternoon programme.

The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora" No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Symphony in C minor No. 1 ..... Brahms
Song with orchestra, "The Loreley" ..... Liszt
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Lia's Aria from "The Prodigal Son" ... Debussy
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Soloist, Mme. Louise Homer.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
Symphonia Domestica ..... Strauss
"Siegfried Idyl" ..... Wagner
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" .. Wagner
Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner

GLOBE—MARCH 5, 1912.

Cecilia Society Soloists.

Owing to the sudden departure from America of Mme Emma Eames and Emilio de Gorgorza the Cecilia Society, which had engaged these artists for the concert to be given in Symphony Hall March 21, was compelled to make radical changes in its plans. Fortunately, however, Mr C. A. Ellis, who has the matter in charge, has been able to find substitutes for these artists. By arrangement with Mr Gatti-Casazza, managing director of the Metropolitan Opera House, Mr Ellis has secured the services of Mme Alma Gluck, soprano, and Leo Slezak, tenor, as soloists for

From AMERICAN
Address New York
Date MAR 17 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will also mark the last appearance here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, which post he has held with so much success for the last four years. On Thursday night the soloist will be Louise Homer, and the principal orchestral work will be Brahm's C-Minor Symphony No. 1. On Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist and the principal orchestral work will be Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which the orchestra played here under Mr. Fiedler's direction almost exactly two years ago. The programme for Thursday evening will include: Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3;

From TIMES
Address New York
Date MAR 17 1912

With its two concerts in Carnegie Hall this week, on Thursday evening, the 21st, and Saturday afternoon, the 23d, the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings to an end the twenty-sixth consecutive season in which it has been a visitor to this city. These concerts will also mark the last appearance here of Max Fiedler, whose engagement with the Boston Symphony ends with the current season. Mr. Fiedler is returning to Germany, and his place next year will be taken by Dr. Karl Muck, who returns to Boston for a term of years.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company and the symphony and principal orchestral number will be Brahms's C minor No. 1. On Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist, the programme being entirely orchestral and the principal work will be Richard Strauss's "Symfonia Domestica," which was played here by the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's direction just two years ago. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Symphony in C minor, No. 1 ..... Brahms
Song with orchestra, "Loreley" ..... Liszt
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Lia's aria from "The Prodigal Son" .. Debussy
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Soloist—Louise Homer.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as fololws:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
"Syufonia Domestica" ..... Strauss
"Siegfried Idyll" ..... Wagner
Funeral music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" ..... Wagner
Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner

From SUN
Address New York
Date MAR 17 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will also mark the last appearances here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, which post he has held with so much success for the last four years. On Thursday night the soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company and the principal orchestral work will be Brahms's C-minor symphony, No. 1. On Saturday afternoon there will be no soloist and the principal orchestral work will be Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which the orchestra played here under Mr. Fiedler's direction almost exactly two years ago.

The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora" No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Symphony in C minor, No. 1 ..... Brahms
Song with orchestra, "The Loreley" ..... Liszt
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Lia's aria from "The Prodigal Son" ..... Debussy
Overture, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Soloist, Mme. Louise Homer.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber
"Symphonia Domestica" ..... Strauss
"Siegfried Idyl" ..... Wagner
Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" .. Wagner
Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner

HERALD,
MARCH 5, 1912.

CECILIA SOCIETY PLANS

Owing to the sudden and unexpected departure from America of Mme. Emma Eames and Emilio de Gorgorza, the Cecilia Society has been compelled to make radical changes in its plans.

Fortunately, however, C. A. Ellis, who has the matter in charge, has been able to find substitutes for these artists who are in every respect their equal. By special arrangement with Mr. Gatti-Casazza, managing director of the Metropolitan Opera House, Mr. Ellis has been able to obtain the services of Mme. Alma Gluck, soprano, and Leo Slezak, tenor, as soloists for this concert.

Mme. Alma Gluck is the foremost of the younger lyric sopranos of this country, and Mr. Slezak is one of the greatest tenors of our time and recently at his song recital in Jordan Hall aroused enthusiasm. Full details regarding the program will be announced shortly.

[162]

From SUN
Address New York
Date MAR 17 1912

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his farewell bow to New York music lovers in the coming week. He retires from his post and Carl Muck resumes his duties interrupted by the claims of the Berlin Opera on his time. Mr. Fiedler came to this country in 1908 to conduct the Boston orchestra and his activities have been such as to command warm admiration. He has been accepted as one of the most interesting of the apostles of Richard Strauss, but it is worthy of note that he has devoted no small measure of his attention to the despised and downtrodden American composer.

A vast amount of rubbish is printed about the prejudice against the native composer and there is a ceaseless wail going upward to the stars that his music is not given a hearing. Very good; now let us have a glance at statistics. Since Mr. Fiedler took command of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he has produced fifty-four novelties. Of these twelve, or almost 25 per cent., have been by Americans.

Here are the titles of some of them: Suite for strings by Arthur Foote, symphonic poem, "Ormad," by F. S. Converse; "Suite Symphonique," by George W. Chadwick; theme, variations and fugue for organ and orchestra, and also a sinfonietta, by the same composer; a symphony and an overture, by Gustave Strube; first performance of MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia"; symphonic poem, "Atala," by A. M. Curry; Henry Hadley's symphonic poem "The Culprit Fay," H. F. B. Gilbert's comedy overture on negro themes, Maquarre's symphonic poem "On the Sea Cliffs."

There was also a symphonic poem called "Norway," by Philip Clapp, which was given at a Cambridge concert, but did not get into the Boston programmes. This makes a total of thirteen American works accorded hearings under Mr. Fiedler's baton.

The representation of other nationalities was headed by that of the Germans, who had fourteen works produced. This includes the "Jena" symphony of Beethoven and a work by Busoni, who is musically German. French composers, among whom Enesco has been counted, record six productions. The Englishmen have also six by three writers, Elgar, Bantock and Delius; the Italians two and the Russians six. Sibelius, the Finn, had six new works placed to his credit, and other novelties were Paderewski's symphony and a piece by Sinding.

The statistician who compiled these figures writes: "If in the majority of cases a single performance was sufficient to satisfy the curiosity of the friends of the composers, these pieces only shared the fate of the majority of foreign novelties, which, despite the roar of brass and shrieks of piccolos, the thunder of tympani and the tinkle of the divine celesta, must be put among the tragedies of still birth."

It is tolerably certain that the American composer has not suffered for want of opportunity in Boston. With the exception of MacDowell's "Lamia," all the native works brought out by Mr. Fiedler were heard for the first time anywhere. Some of them had the good fortune to be heard elsewhere after the Boston conductor had ushered them into the limelight.

The truth is not that the American composer's music does not get a hearing but that it seldom gets a second one. And that is not the fault of the wicked and conspiring conductors, but of hard hearted, unpatriotic audiences who do not care a copper cent whether music is domestic or imported, but only whether it interests them. If the first audience does not make a sufficient tumult of joy over a new work to reach the ear of the conductor in the next town the second performance does not take place. The composition goes to sleep beside its cradle and never wakes up.

And then the agitators begin the old outcry that the conductors do not give the American composer an opportunity to be heard. In recent seasons there has been a large public supply of American music and some of it will undoubtedly be heard again, for it is pleasing. But most of it will gently fall asleep. And so will most of the imported music. But no one uplifts the voice of blame against conductors for not persisting in repetition of European music which no one desires.

W. J. HENDERSON.

JOURNAL
MARCH 5,

Gluck and Slezak to Sing With the Cecilia Society

Owing to the sudden and unexpected departure from America of Mme. Emma Eames and Emilio de Gorgorza, the Cecilia Society, which had engaged these artists for their concert to be given in Symphony Hall on March 21, was compelled to make radical changes in its plans. By special arrangement with Mr. Gatti-Casazza, managing director of the Metropolitan Opera House, C. A. Ellis has been able to secure the services of Mme. Alma Gluck, soprano, and Leo Slezak, tenor, as soloists for this concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World RECORD
From ....
Address ....
Date MAR 19 1912

FAREWELL TO FIEDLER

Boston Orchestra Conductor's Last Local Visit—Homer as Soloist.

The reception given Max Fiedler when he appeared on the stage at the Academy of Music last night left no doubt of the security of his artistic status in Philadelphia. The demonstration, which lasted several minutes, was in recognition of his last appearance here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The four seasons during which he has directed the musical destiny of the greatest orchestra in America, and perhaps in the world, have been seasons of marked progress. The general impression gained from Fiedler's readings has been one of deep scholarly insight into the music interpreted, coupled with an earnest desire to present the thought of the composer as accurately and as artistically as possible. He has never displayed temperament of the kind that conveys emotional enthusiasm. But, on the other hand, he has never exhibited any tendency toward dry, pedantic readings as effected by many scholarly conductors. He expresses, as a rule, the happy medium of the musical mind, eminently distinguished and effective, without being in any sense afflicted with the virtuoso mania. His departure will be a real loss to the orchestra-going public.

Last night's program was interesting in many respects, but painful in that it contained the inexpressively boring "Symphonia Domestica," by Strauss. Many of those who have suffered patiently through this impossible and illogical attempt at musical delineation of the Strauss' domestic life were doubtless amazed that Fiedler should have chosen the work as a farewell to Philadelphia audiences. Only a deep admiration for the composer can explain such a choice, although it must be admitted that the playing of this unmusical and aggressively egotistical work was wonderful as a piece of purely mechanical perfection. The great pity was that the superb orchestra should be used in such a cause.

Louise Homer, leading contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, appeared as soloist. She sang first Liszt's "The Loreley" and later Debussy's Recitative and Aria of "Lia," from "L'Enfant Prodigue." The popular singer was in fine voice and sang the Debussy number in faultless style. The Liszt number was also beautifully done. Her greatest triumph, however, was with the "Lia" Aria. The music suited her voice perfectly, and was so appreciated that several recalls were demanded. Wagner's Siegfried Idyl, Beethoven's Leonora Overture No. 3 and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischuetz" completed the orchestral offerings.

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date ....

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Last Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Max Fiedler, gave its last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening before one of the largest audiences to which it has played this year. A program of varied attractiveness had been arranged for the occasion. It presented as its central feature the turgid and amorphous "Sinfonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, two overtures, that by Beethoven known as Leonora No 3 and the "Der Freischutz" of Weber, and the Siegfried Idyll.

Every one will recognize the interest and value of this scheme. The Strauss number is one of those things about which tastes differ. There are those who like it very much and who regard it as one of the masterpieces of modern musical production, while to others it is a bad joke, involving merely vanity and vexation of spirit. It is, however, unquestionably and admittedly an extraordinary tour de force in the way of orchestration and conductors like to play it because it affords them such a fine opportunity to display their own interpretative powers and to exhibit the virtuosity or the organization which they direct.

Each of these demonstrations was most impressively made last evening and the applause into which the audience broke spontaneously at its conclusion no doubt bespoke its admiration of a particularly fine performance. The other things were also superbly played, with the utmost beauty of tone, brilliancy of execution and refinement of phrasing, and Mr. Fiedler, who is about to take his departure home and who will not lead the orchestra next year, may be said to have made his local exit in a blaze of glory.

The assisting artist last evening was Mme. Louise Homer, who was very cordially received and who sang Liszt's "Lorelei" and an air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue" with all her accustomed opulence of voice and artistic skill of vocalization.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 19 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Louise Homer Sings at Max Fiedler's Farewell.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, "Der Freischuetz" ..... Weber
Domestic Symphony ..... Strauss
"The Loreley" ..... Liszt
Siegfried Idyl ..... Wagner
Recitative and Aria of Lia, from "L'Enfant Prodigue" ..... Debussy
Overture, "eonora," No. 3 ..... Beethoven

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last evening not merely concluded the season's series, but was the occasion of reluctant farewell to Conductor Max Fiedler, who returns to Germany in May. He is to be followed next autumn by Karl Muck, whom Fiedler succeeded four years ago. In this brief term of his association with the orchestra he has not merely maintained but augmented its prestige, developed its solidarity and worthily continued its traditions and enlarged its inheritance from the devotion and intelligent scholarship of earlier leaders. Fiedler has been much more than the drillmaster, the pedant chalking out problems on an invisible blackboard with those precise and masterful strokes that command not merely the musicians before him but his own being. One felt last night more than ever how his training of this organization has been with him a labor of love—how he has built his own life into the finished product and toiled in the erection of his own monument. It is, on all counts, deeply to be regretted that he cannot remain here for untold years of further activity, to witness the fruition of his own unstinted toil.

The orchestra read with its customary security of intonation, perfect adjustment of balance among the several choirs, and flawless purity of tonal output, the wide variety represented in the diverse moods and tenses of the programme. Whether the family in the "Domestic Symphony" has or has not learned to live on 24 hours a day with that extraordinarily obstreperous infant, is aside from the question. The indefatigably busy instruments found no complexity of the score too tortuous for their skill, and laid on the plangent tone and color so that it was perfectly plain whether the baby hated his bath or his bedtime or bumped his precious nose or was rapturously visited by his maiden aunts. A noble interpretation was offered of the "Leonora" overture, with its customary thrilling interpolation of the trumpet off the scene.

Louise Homer was the soloist. Her deep, soul-reaching contralto is finer than ever, and none who heard it will soon forget the sharply agonized accentuation of "Azael, Azael!" in the lament of the mother for her child, or the upsoaring second syllable of "Heureux," in the line "Heureux dans leurs enfants," wherein she contrasts the lot of those more fortunate with her own poignant deprivation.

True it may be that Madame Homer allows herself more than a poetic latitude in the elision of the consonantal rasp of German gutturals, or the less liquid sounds that punctuate the graceful urbanities of the French tongue. She may pin her faith too much to the saying that "none may hope to scale the heights of Parnassus who crams his mouth whilst singing with a gritty handful of consonants." But her singing finds the heart, and that is the important thing, after all, with every species of artistic expression.

The house held an immense and most enthusiastic audience, that recalled the soloist and the conductor many times, and remained afterward for a protracted final demonstration of farewell to Mr. Fiedler.

From PRESS
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 19 1912

FAREWELL CONCERT BY CONDUCTOR FIEDLER

In the fifth and last concert in this city this season Max Fiedler made his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. A distinguished audience that filled the Academy of Music to overflowing expressed its high regard for the man and his attainments with an enthusiasm second only to the intense interest it manifested in his masterly interpretation of the music rendered. The soloist of the occasion was Madame Louise Homer, who sang two numbers with splendid feeling and dramatic power. Notwithstanding insistent demands, no encores were given, so as not to break in any way the artistic unity of the program.

The overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz" was the opening number, and seldom is such a splendid rendition heard as it was given last night. Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" followed in masterly style. Then came Madame Homer in Liszt's setting of "The Loreley," which while not making as great demands as the more dramatic "Recitative and Aria of Lia," from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," exploited the sympathetic qualities of the soloist's voice to excellent advantage. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" was rendered between the two vocal selections, with a delicacy that left little to desire.

The closing number, Beethoven's "Leonora," No. 3, overture, was also given a distinctly fine interpretation, and at its conclusion the audience stood and applauded for a full three minutes while Fiedler, with the modesty for which he is noted, unassumingly bowed his thanks and his much-to-be-regretted farewell.

Mr. Slezak, the tenor, and Miss Gluck, the soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the assisting singers at the concert of the Cecilia on March 21. The town discovered the pleasure of Mr. Slezak as a concert singer a month ago with surprise and satisfaction, and it has heard and liked Miss Gluck at the Symphony Concerts. To the arts of the opera house, she adds the arts of the singer of songs; and she does all things with a quick and warm emotion.

[163]

From HERALD
Address New York
Date MAR 20 1912

Society Attends Two Musicales in Washington

Boston Symphony, with Mme. Homer as Soloist and Mr. Ernest Hutcheson Pianist, Are Heard.

HERALD BUREAU, No. 1,502 H STREET, N. W., WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

With almost summerlike weather society gave itself over to two musicales, one in the morning and another in the afternoon, with drives and informal luncheons between. The usual concert this afternoon by the Boston Symphony, with Mme. Louise Homer as the soloist, was given in the National Theatre.

Count von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador, and Countess von Bernstorff occupied a box, having with them Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Augustus P. Gardner and Count de Monceau of the Belgian Legation. Mrs. L. Z. Leiter was in another box with the British Ambassador and Mrs. James Bryce, Mrs. Charles E. Hughes, Mrs. Harriet Blaine Beale and Miss Marie Stevens. In another box was Mrs. James McMillan, whose guests included Mrs. Preston Gibson, Viscountess Benoist d'Azy, wife of the Naval Attaché of the French Embassy, and Mme. von Haniel, wife of the Counsellor of the German Embassy. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had guests in another box, and among others in the audience were Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Robert Hinckley and Mrs. John E. Reyburn.

W. Sinclair Bowen presented Mr.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 4, 1912

THE WEEK-END CONCERTS

TSCHAIKOWSKY, MISS GERHARDT, MR. LHEVINNE

A Concert for the Pension Fund and a Piano Recital—Present Moods Toward the Russian's Music—Miss Gerhardt's Singing in Most of Its Virtues—The New Lhevinne of Tempered Power, Tonal Beauty and Sober Understanding and Feeling

UNSATED with Wagner's music, alike in the Opera House or the concert-hall, perhaps we in Boston are beginning to rebel a little at overmuch of Tschaikowsky. The orchestral part of the concert for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra last evening in Symphony Hall consisted wholly of the Russian's music—the Pathetic Symphony, the dances from the ballet of "The Nutcracker" and the overture "1812," accounted the three best-liked and most generally "popular" excerpts from it. Yet there were rows of empty seats on the floor and a vacant chair here and there in the balcony that even the vogue of Miss Gerhardt, the singer of the evening, could not fill. Tschaikowsky was well-partnered and well-played, but he could not fill the hall, as Wagner has filled it on many a Sunday evening for the Pension Fund. Admittedly Tschaikowsky's music has been played too often in London, perhaps in New York, and in one or two other cities, but here in Boston in recent years there has been no such excess of it. Nowadays the Parisians and the Viennese like to plume themselves on their indifference to Tschaikowsky's music—behold, in the long run, it was we that judged it rightly—and it is becoming the part of superior musical righteousness the world over to depreciate it. As there has been a rebound from the earlier vogue and acclamation of Tschaikowsky in the Western world, so inevitably will come with the years a reaction from the present over-depreciation of it.

The depreciatory process is easy. The musical thoughts are too obvious and they lack subtlety. The dullest auditor readily grasps the songful melody of the first movement of the Pathetic Symphony, the syncopations and the reiterated drum-beat of the slow movement, the slithering feverish march tune of the scherzo and so on. The "Nutcracker" dances are no more than pretty and easy tunes, adroitly rhythmed, brightly colored; while the "1812" overture is "ordinary" in its conflict of French and Russian tunes, as "patriotic music" should be. The emotional contents of the symphony are as obvious—the reiterated struggle of a neurotic spirit with its despair and yet its infatuation with life. The turbulence of the march will not sooth it; nor yet the phantom pleasures of the dance that never dances; nor yet the memories of sensuous delights that the songful theme recalls and curdles. There is feverish tonal struggle, furious tonal outbreak, weary tonal decline into the shadows of despair. Let us have done with these elementary Slav emotions, with these insistent singularities, running through three symphonies, of a racial and individual temperament. So runs the plaint of the weary, the over-righteous, the fashionably detracting. They go on to say, if they happen to be musically schooled, that Tschaikowsky varies, re-dresses, merely juxtaposes his melodies, whereas he should develop and interweave them; that he has a pretty knack or a large power with instrumental coloring; that the "Nutcracker" dances are only pretty tinsel and the "1812" overture mere sound and fury for a Russian "Fourth-of-July."

The Russians will hear [illegible] ture many times this year, for if the French in all these decades of Napoleon's centenaries, have declined to celebrate his victories, the Russians are already preparing to celebrate the defeats that drove the emperor westward again. They will hear its "barbaric sonorities" as the detractors say, doubtless with due patriotic thrill, but we that sat in Symphony Hall last evening heard them also, unless we were superior, with a measure of response to their power of battling, upbuilded, triumphant sound. And when the virtuosi of the Symphony Orchestra play the dances from "The Nutcracker," they are not "obvious," ballet tunes. (The "Arabian Dance," in fact, is very subtle in its languorous suggestion as most "oriental" music goes). They are rather delicate and adroit or rich and savory tonal fancies clothed with warm or shimmering instrumental colors and moving to irresistibly graphic and playful rhythms. And as for the symphony, some of us, who may be heartily weary of that recurring melody of sensuous satisfactions gone stale, still thrill to the stress of spiritual struggle with which the orchestra shivers and twists and cries and shudders in the first movement, and may still feel the ghostly voice of the hollow, broken rhythmed slow movement, the nervous excitement of the march (which Mr. Fiedler still takes too fast to get all its feverish accelerations and recessions), and the despair, darker and darker still, that dies into the utter blackness of their end. Barbarian, if you will, but who of us is not a barbarian, a little under the skin of all this precious civilization of ours? At least the orchestra had its meed last night. After the symphony, after the dances, the audience had every man on his feet. The Pension Fund Concerts are its concerts.

Perhaps for that reason, eminent singers proffer their aid so often to these concerts, as Miss Gerhardt did last evening, receive publicly the wreath tied with their national colors that the orchestra officially gives them and the personal gift—for Miss Gerhardt it was a silver case—that the men of themselves bestow. They receive also, again as Miss Gerhardt did, the applause of an audience that adds to the pleasure of their singing, at least half a thought of the generous impulse behind. Miss Gerhardt sang with orchestra three of Wagner's five surviving songs, and with piano five of Schumann's, two or three of which she repeated out of her recitals here. Her singing was not quite so rich in sensuous beauty and in imparting emotion as it was a fortnight ago at the regular Symphony Concerts—one may not be so "on edge" at will—but it was unclouded by any touch of weariness or bodily malaise. There was not a hint of the unsteadiness of voice which is the penalty with her, of weariness, and hardly a trace of the explosive upper tones which, with her, is the token of effort. So unclouded in voice and unvexed in spirit, Miss Gerhardt sang Schumann's "Mondnacht" with the deep, sustained, enfolding beauty of tone and intensity of brooding and rapturous mood that she brings to pieces so glowing with static emotion. Then, and again in Wagner's "Traume" her middle tones had their richest, their loveliest, their most suffusing quality. She was as fortunate, and by like means, with the sombre mood and the sombre coloring of "Ich Groele Nicht," and again with the buoyant and mounting "Fruhlingsnacht." For there can be lighter ecstasy as well as deep rapture in her voice, and she knows the secret of both thin and rich tones.

Above all, Miss Gerhardt excelled, as the singing of these elusive songs of Wagner goes, in "Stehe Still" and "Schmerzen." He and Mathilde Wesendonck were deep in their passion for each other when they wrote them. German-wise they turned it transcendental, when they set their verse-making or their music-making hands to paper. They set down big, vague almost steamy sentimentalities and aspirations, but to them they had a very personal and poignant emotion. In such wise Miss Gerhardt sang these songs. Her tones, her style with them was large and declamatory, yet propelling both was a keen and almost personal intensity. She sany them thus with beauty of voice, with pervading eloquence, and yet with the sincerity of emotion that lifts these German romantic moods into the high and abstract intensities of music. No singer that has come to us from Germany in recent years has been so potent with them as Miss Gerhardt. They are the complement of the richness of her voice, of her sense and skill of delineative style.

H. T. P.

When Maud Powell, the violinist, reappears at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, she will repeat Sibelius's concerto that she first made known here four years ago. She gives a hint of her reasons for the choice in the following fragment from an interview with her printed today in the New York Times: "We violinists do have our difficulties in finding new pieces. Bruch's new concerto is only moderately satisfactory. I have played it on some of my programmes this season, but the unfortunate lack of a third movement has proved a drawback. Then the slow movement is lacking in contrast. I think the slow movement Bruch wrote in England, and the first movement when he was twenty years old. He simply put them together. Their publication is recent, but not their inspiration, I am sure. Sibelius's concerto is a great favorite of mine, and I am to play it in Boston this week with the Symphony Orchestra, by request, mind you, of critics and public both. The music has not been liked in New York, but they are fond of it in Boston.

"What are we poor violinists to do? The literature for the violin is so poor. The critics in Berlin recently jumped on Elman because he performed Tschaikowsky's concerto. 'Is he going to play this forever?' they asked. But what is there? Even the good violin pieces are usually not the great music of the composers. Brahms's concerto is inferior to his symphonies; Tschaikowsky's concerto is inferior to his symphonies. Perhaps Beethoven's is n't. And Mendelssohn's concerto is assuredly better than his symphonies, a master work for the violin that, but so hackneyed! Even in my recent trip to Florida they asked me not to play it. Occasionally one can play Goldmark's concerto, but it is not the composer at his best as he is in 'The Queen of Sheba' or 'Sakuntala.' Vieuxtemps is almost dead, and de Beriot quite. Elgar's new concerto seems to me empty and pompous."

The New Custom of Announcing Pieces—Mr. Slezak and Mme. Gluck to Sing with the Opera—Calve Again at the Opera House—A Projected Pelleas—Miss Powell and Her Concerto at the Symphony Concerts

WHEN Miss Gerhardt sang an extra piece at the Pension Fund concert last evening, she did not announce it to her audience by title and composer, as her way has been at recitals of her own with such additions to her programme. Perhaps she believed the hall too large for her speaking voice; perhaps she was unwilling to depart in any way from the time-honored manners and customs of concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. From one point of view, however, it was a pity that she did not make a numerous and miscellaneous audience acquainted with the excellent innovation in this respect that is making its way this season in our concerts. Miss Gerhardt has announced her extra pieces by a word to the audience before she began to sing them, and Mr. Slezak and a few others have done so, too. The listener thus knows what the singer is about to sing and gains a clew to the music from the title and the name of the composer. He is the more receptive accordingly, and he wastes no mental energy in speculation about the additional piece or in whispered inquiries to wiser neighbors. And he has as much right to this knowledge of the extra pieces as he has to those that the programme specifies. It is a silly and hollow formalism that keeps the singer mute on the stage, except when he or she sings. To announce the extra pieces is to be human and, as it were, intimate toward the audience. The pianists and the violinists might wisely imitate this new way of the singers and receive in their turn the answering applause to their announcement of a well-liked piece.

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 22, 1912

MR. FIEDLER'S FAREWELLS

New York Begins a Warm Leave-Taking by Both Audience and Reviewers—Philadelphia and Washington Applausive, Too

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, on its final visit of the season to New York, gave the first of its two concerts last evening in Carnegie Hall. At these concerts Mr. Fiedler makes his last appearances here as conductor of the orchestra, as his engagement in Boston ends with the present season. The fact was recognized by the audience last evening, which gave Mr. Fiedler long and enthusiastic applause as he came upon the platform. It had occasion through the evening to renew this enthusiasm repeatedly, for the performance, both Mr. Fiedler's part in it and that of his men, was of such magnificence as this wonderful organization has rarely given in all the glorious years of its history. There was a renewed demonstration in his honor at the close of the concert, and he was made to feel the esteem in which he is held her. [The New York Times.

The performance of Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture was solid and excellent, but it was not the grand proclamation of the concert. This came with Brahms's symphony in C minor. From beginning to end its performance was one of the most notable ever heard in New York. Flawless beauty of tone, perfect balance of the instrumental parts, absolute precision and an orchestral cantilena of matchless smoothness were the striking technical merits of this performance. But these mechanical excellences were the means by which a noble and indeed majestic delivery of the symphony was brought about. In the last movement the interpretation rose to such a height as almost to justify the use of the most exclusive of all adjectives, sublime. At any rate it was a glorious and inspiring performance of one of the mightiest masterpieces of orchestral music, and with the memory of it in mind the Thursday evening subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts will cherish kind thoughts of Max Fiedler. [The Sun.

It was an evening of triumph for Mr. Fiedler, whose departure from America is sincerely deplored by the patrons of the Boston Orchestra in New York. He had a superb welcome on his entrance, was called and recalled to receive demonstrations of enthusiasm after every number and at the close was applauded to the echo. [The Tribune.

Max Fiedler, the conductor, had every element likely to leave pleasant recollections for his final appearance in Philadelphia with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday evening in the Academy of Music. Mr. Fiedler is just now compassing the round of cities which the band from Boston visits annually, making his devoirs and farewells. His work as an expert leader of orchestral players and accomplished reader of orchestral music has made a favorable impression on local, as well as New York and Boston, music lovers during his incumbency of the directorship of the Boston Symphony, which he is about to relinquish. So Monday night he had an audience that taxed the capacity of the Academy and one which was bent on paying the tribute of appreciation, as expressed in applause, to a very able musician. [The Philadelphia Record.

Mr. Fiedler received a most cordial greeting upon his entrance on the stage [in Washington], but this was eclipsed by the splendid tribute of applause which followed his dramatic and heroic reading of the "Tannhäuser" overture, which brought his services in the Capital to an end for the time being. [The Washington Times.

GLOBE
MARCH 16, 1912.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Fine Performance of the Symphonia Domestica.

Mr Bachaus Displays More Technic Than Temperament as a Pianist.

The program at the 19th Symphony rehearsal was as follows: Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz"; Strauss, Symphonia Domestica; Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte No. 5, in E flat major, Wilhelm Bachaus, soloist.

Neither the program nor the performance call for extended comment. This gigantic page from Strauss' autobiography is now known. The composer has been sorely rebuked for committing an intimate account of his daily walk and conversation to an orchestral narrative for the world to hear. If he chooses to perpetuate in tone the doings of the Strauss household from 7 p m to 7 a m later, mater and the young Strauss and then who is he that shall frown. It is an excellent thing to see a family astir betimes in the morning. This one shows remarkable activity at the break of dawn.

It is related by trustworthy and competent testimony that Mr Strauss' first acquaintance with the lady who subsequently became Mrs Strauss was at a rehearsal in a theatre where she was a singer. It appears that a certain portion of her performance invited criticism and admonition from the conductor, who was none other than Herr Strauss. At this juncture the singer straightway threw her score at his head. The conductor dodged the same, permitting it to hit the concert master, and then turned to him with the remark that the woman had made a favorable impression upon him.

It is unfortunate that the Domestica did not begin in point of time so as to include this episode, inasmuch as other more minute but less striking occurrences in the family history are duly recorded. There are those to whom the employment of Strauss' epic and epoch-making musical invention and his mastery of a titanic orchestral apparatus, to mouth the rhymes and the pretty exhibitions of the nursery, is irrelevant and even grievous. To some it savors of a colossal egotism, of a type which certain so-called clever men know not that they possess.

Whatever the program which Strauss employed, the orchestral sounds remain, and as a gorgeous tapestry of tone, it can suggest its own pictures. There are pages wherein the composer appears to dwell too long, as in the love music, not a common trait with him, but the sweep of the man's imagination is breath taking, appalling. The infinite range of variety in his sense of the aesthetic and the dramatizing value of rhythm, of an instrumental timbre, is the oboe d'amore (used yesterday) for the naive voice of the child, and of the combination of tints, his amazing skill in graphic realism, in complicated combinations, in contrapuntal weaving.

The work betrays a weakness at times in the point and force of theme, and there is not always the coherence in the evolution of section from section that marks even the earlier Don Juan, but there are pages of lofty inspiration, and the orchestra is made a glorified, puissant instrument.

It was such yesterday. There were a few moments of a disturbing tonality in the 'cellos late in the love music, but the performance as a whole was superb, a magnificent exhibition of virtuosity in which even Strauss' merciless demands upon the trumpet and the brass were not made in vain.

Mr Fiedler conducted with an ardor stirred by imagination and refined by a discretion which he has not often shown here. There were moments, as in the overture, of elasticity and direct emotional appeal. The enthusiastic applause for both conductor and players was richly deserved.

Mr Bachans' playing was distinguished chiefly for the remarkable fluidity of his hand and finger technic. In rapid passages he seems to pour the tone along the keys. He exhibits great dexterity at the keyboard, in fleetness, accuracy and precision. In New York, he has been pronounced a player of dignified yet communicating emotion. None but those gifted with a rare and psychic discernment, however, can hope to divine such qualities in his performance.

In the slow movement his playing was architecturally praiseworthy but emotionally meager. His tone was frequently harsh, was devoid of sympathy or singing quality, and in the lighter arabesque was at times inaudible.

Next week the orchestra will make its fifth Southern trip. The program at the concerts of March 29 and 30 will include Rachmaninoff's second symphony, Mozart's concerto No. 4 for violin, Mr. Noack, soloist, and Mendelssohn's overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Boston Transcript

THE CECILIA, MR. SLEZAK AND MME. GLUCK

A Concert in Which the Audience Made the Choir an Accessory—Its Uneven Quality Mr. Loeffler's Dirge Sung Again—The Contrast of the Tenor and the Soprano

CERTAINLY the concert of the Cecilia, Mr. Slezak and Mme. Gluck (who "assisted" it according to the programme), gave pleasure to the audience last evening in Symphony Hall, but it is doubtful whether such concerts will do much to restore the prestige of the choral society or whether they are a wise policy for it to follow unless it is to become an accessory to its own ventures. That is to say, the interest of the audience quickly concentrated itself upon the tenor and the soprano and held fast to them through a concert two hours and a half long. Here were two eminent singers from a great opera house. They were engrossing and acclaimed personalities. Mme. Gluck sang with loveliness of tone, adroit artistry, light intensity or light playfulness of feeling, with unfailing charm of voice and manner. Mr. Slezak displayed vocal and expressive qualities, if not always virtues, that stirred the audience by sharp contrasts of tone and mood, by extremes of finesse and purling tone and of broad declamatory energy. There were encores and "double encores," and before the concert was done, Mr. Slezak and Mme. Gluck had sung nineteen times. Between whiles, the choir sang its numbers—some unaccompanied, some to organ or pianoforte, but none with orchestra. Two of these choral pieces, Mr Loffler's setting of Parsons's ode "To One Who Fell in Battle" and Mr. Foote's graceful little trio for women's voices, interested the audience and won hearty applause that continued until the composers had bowed responsively from their places in the hall. The other choral pieces came and went with only perfunctory heed and applause for Mr. Mees and the choir; while two or three of them were of the common sort to be found oftener on the programme of suburban singing clubs than of a choral society of high rank in a metropolitan city.

In fine the Cecilia was very like an accessory to its own concert, and its share in it—this condition aside—was not always the most interesting, the most achieving or the most distinguished part of the occasion. By all means the Cecilia should engage the ablest and the most eminent singers within its reach when they are to be the "soloists" in a choral piece that fills the evening. When, however, they theoretically "assist" in a miscellaneous concert, they are bound practically to dominate it. Nor are miscellaneous concerts, like that of last evening, exactly those in which the Cecilia in its present estate, most shines. It needs the intrinsic interest of choral music of large dimensions, and kindling appeal to buttress it. Yesterday it had such support in the felicity of imagination and the finely tempered workmanship of Mr. Loeffler's music, in the charm of Mr. Foote's and in the shimmering beauty of Verdi's hymn to the Virgin. The interest of Bach's motet, of Cornelius's eight-part piece in praise of love, and of the final ditties depended much upon the quality of the performance. It did not often make that interest considerable.

The personnel of the Cecilia has changed much in recent years and fewer trained singers now sit in its choir. It has passed, too, from conductor to conductor and only this year has Mr. Mees worked with it. Yet it still keeps some of its former distinctions and it has added one and another new quality to them. Beyond question, it sang last evening, in Mr. Loeffler's ode with more variety, justness and significance of expression than it has attained on many an occasion in recent years; while in Mr. Foote's trio and in Verdi's hymn the women's tone was transparent and elastic, warm and rich. With Mr. Loeffler's music, there was clear transmission alike through singers and conductor of its symphonic continuity, of its flow to the verses of the baffling poem that it glorifies, of its rising accents of a noble grief finding its images and its consolation in the rain and the wind, the sunlight and starlight, the pine and the clover over the soldier's grave—for his spirit was kin to them. The dirge is music of man lamenting man without neurotic transports; music in which imagination fuses the aspects of nature and the aspects of the human spirit, and music that brings these emotions to utterance by most ingenious and exacting means, that flower into a grave and piercing beauty. Like the composer in the writing, the Cecilia and Mr. Mees in the singing hid the means in the achievement.

Again, the women's voices were good to hear in Mr. Foote's piece and in Verdi's hymn. In both, their tone was bright, clear and smooth, fitting in quality, sensitive to the play of vocal arabesque and the shading of melodic line, imparting the pervading mood and the momentary variation of it. In these three pieces the choir sang with an artistry that was often distinction. In the rest it was a capable body of choral singers, not too secure in Bach's or Cornelius's interwoven tonal patterns or merely ambling its way through the other trifling pieces. Not one, however, of all these was exactly kindling in itself. In sum, then, Mr. Mees's work was now of an able conductor, rising with his music and bringing his choir to the level of it, and again of no more than a capable leader of a capable chorus.

The tireless applause for the "assisting" singers rewarded perverse fascinations in Mr. Slezak and high vocal virtue in Mme. Gluck. The tenor was pleased to exaggerate almost all the qualities that had justly praised him in his recent recital here. He bore so hard upon some of his upper tones that they shook; or he made some of the lower so intense that they became pinched and throaty. He declaimed with the energy of a chieftain summoning a tribal host or he spun an exquisite filigree of subdued and shimmering tenor tone. The nearer he could bring these contrasts to each other, the better it pleased him and his audience, and his show of sentiment was as broad and thick as his own shoulders. Now Mr. Slezak so mannered is far less interesting and artistic than Mr. Slezak singing with juster tone and expression, with somewhat more of his music and somewhat less of himself.

Mme. Gluck, on the other hand, exactly mingled personality and artistry, the singer's voice and the composer's song. Her tones have a mingled softness and brightness that individualizes them. They flow with a perfect smoothness and roundness, yielding to the lightest touch of music or feeling. She orders them with a discerning and delicate artistry that hides itself or charms by the pretty and visible artifice of the moment. She is mistress of the elegant simplicity of Rameau or Mozart; she is playful and arch in light songs; she knows subtle suggestion when Rimsky-Korsakoff asks it of her. Each piece of the many that she sang had its characteristic vein though she ranged from pretty sentiment to poetic melancholy and exotic tang. To voice and vocal skill Mme. Gluck adds intelligence and imagination. And so she is a singer—the singer, almost, of our youngest vocal generation.

H. T. P.

JOURNAL
MARCH 22, 1912.

COMPOSERS HEAR CECILIA CONCERT

Show Themselves to Audience in Response to Repeated Calls.

Two composers attended the Cecilia Society concert at Symphony Hall last night and unexpectedly participated in the honors of the occasion. Charles Martin Loeffler rose from his seat in the middle of the floor in response to repeated calls after the performance of his dramatic choral setting of T. W. Parson's ode, "For One Who Fell in Battle." Then Arthur Foote stood up in his usual place on the right-hand side of the first balcony when the sopranos and contraltos had sung his trio "Tomorrow." The Loeffler song was familiar, but the Foote trio was brand new.

Two Bright Stars

But the bright particular stars of the evening were Alma Gluck and Leo Slezak of the Metropolitan Opera Company. They sang in all some twenty songs. Mme. Gluck, a soprano whose art is no less charming than her personality, gave especial pleasure with Schindler's delightful arrangement of an old Tuscan folk song, "La Columba," with Mozart's "Warnung," Thayer's Scottish leap year ditty, "My Laddie," and Dr. Arne's "Lass With the Delicate Air." Mr. Slezak, the Brobdingnagian tenor, sang Assad's narrative from Goldmark's opera, "The Queen of Sheba," and some songs in German and English. The audience found as much to admire in his beautiful style as in his splendid voice. Kurt Schindler's accompaniments to the songs were as praiseworthy as was his arrangement of the Italian folk song.

Audience Enthusiastic

Of the choral numbers, not only the Foote trio, but a motet by J. S. Bach, "Praise the Lord, All Ye Heathen," and Cornelius's "Liebe Dir Ergeb Ich Mich," an eight-part song, were heard here for the first time. Verdi's "Hymn to the Virgin Mary," from Dante; Cui's "Spring Delight," with words by the Boston poet, Nathan Haskell Dole; Benedict's "Hunting Song," and Kremser's "Netherland's Folk Song" were also on the program. Dr. Arthur Mees conducted and Benjamin Guckenberger and Professor Marshall played accompaniments. The choral singing was ragged at times, particularly in the Bach and Verdi pieces, when it seemed that a comparatively few singers were doing most of the work.

The large audience was very enthusiastic.

[164]

HERALD
MARCH 22, 1912

CECILIA SOCIETY GIVES CONCERT

Second and Last of the Season Enjoyed by an Enthusiastic Audience.

MME. GLUCK AND SLEZAK

Singing of Visitors Delights House—Many Repetitions Demanded.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Cecilia Society, Arthur Mees conductor, gave the second and last concert of the season last evening in Symphony Hall. The society sang Bach's motet "Praise the Lord, All Ye Heathen", Verdi's Hymn to the Virgin, Cornelius's "Liebe dir ergeb ich mich," Loeffler's "For One Who Fell in Battle," Foote's "Tomorrow," Cui's "Spring Delight," Benedict's Hunting Song and a Netherland Folk Song arranged by Kremser.

Mme. Alma Gluck sang the following songs: Rameau, Rossignole; Schindler, La Colomba; Mozart, Warnung; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Song of the Sitgirl; Loehl, and Chant Hindu; Paladilhe, Psyche; Thayer, My Laddie.

Leo Slezak sang these songs: Herrmann, Salomo; Wolf, Verschwiegene Liebe; Liszt, Die Loreley; Woodman, Ashes of Roses; Rummel, Ecstasy and Assad's Narrative from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba." Kurt schindler of New York played the piano accompaniments for the two singers.

This concert might have been more justly announced as a concert given by Mme. Gluck and Mr. Slezak, assisted by the Cecilia Society; for the audience was so delighted with the singing of the visitors that it called them back several times and the singers had thoughtfully provided themselves with additional songs "in case of an emergency."

The features of the choral performance were Verdi's beautiful "Hymn to the Virgin Mary," Mr. Loeffler's elaborate and impressive music to Dr. Parsons's poem, which is far less poetic than the music, and Mr. Foote's "Tomorrow," a trio for female voices which was performed for the first time. Bach's motet and the chorus by Cornelius were performed for the first time in Boston, according to the program. The pages of the former are not among the most inspired of Bach, and Cornelius does not rise to any height above the conventional until toward the end of Schindler's poem. Mr. Foote's trio is simple and unpretending, but it is melodious, graceful, expressive of the text.

Mr. Loeffler's dirge was first heard here in 1906, when it was not fully appreciated. Last night its imaginative force, its beauty that has the desired strangeness in its proportions, its wilderness of grief, its nobility of sentiment were more clearly revealed. It is to be regretted that compositions of this rank are heard only at long intervals of time. A repetition last night would have been more to the purpose than the insatiate desire of some in the audience to hear ballads from the solo singers. In spite of the difficulty of the task, the Cecilia sang Mr. Loeffler's Dirge effectively. He and Mr. Foote were obliged to rise and bow in acknowledgment of the hearty applause.

The performance of the other choral works might be described as generally and eminently respectable. It was not always characterized by the higher qualities that give life to mere technical proficiency. There were times, especially in Bach's motet, when it seemed as though a few in each part, who had been faithful in rehearsal and had the courage of their convictions, dirtied along their associates, who were faltering, or had dropped for a moment by the wayside. Thus a phrase would be attacked sonorously, then grow thinner and thinner, but at the end recover fulness. On the other hand, there was more attention paid to the nuances of expression than in certain concerts of the last few years.

Mme. Gluck of the pure and lovely voice gave much pleasure. She sang with skill the delightfully old-fashioned air of Rameau. Mr. Schindler's "Colomba" with its tinge of tender melancholy was so much liked that the singer repeated it. The songs of Rimsky-Korsakoff had a peculiar charm, nor was this due solely to the voice and art of the singer. The "Chant Hindu" is beautiful in its exoticism. Paladilhe's "Psyche" has more character than the majority of his songs.

Mr. Slezak sang in his own manner, to which we all are now accustomed. It is seldom that a singer of his prominence shows at the same time so many genuine virtues and so many grievous faults. As before, he sang now in Ercles' vein, and then he would "woo you as gently as any sucking dove"; he would sing fluently and frankly with fine tonal quality, and the next moment pinch tone until it resembled a bleat. Nevertheless there was more to praise than to condemn in his performance.

Mr. Schindler played sympathetic accompaniments.

MONITOR, MARCH 22, 1912

CECILIA PATRIOTISM APPLAUDED

The Cecilia Society, Arthur Mees, conductor, gave its second and last concert of the season in Symphony hall Thursday evening, with Mme. Alma Gluck, soprano, and Leo Slezak, tenor, assisting in individual programs. All the works given by the society were of a purely choral description and most of them were without accompaniment. John P. Marshall assisted as organist, Fernando Tanara as pianist. The choruses were the following: Bach's Psalm CXVIII., "Praise the Lord, All Ye Heathen"; Verdi's "Hymn to the Virgin Mary," for women's voices; Cornelius' eight-part chorus, "Liebe Dir Ergeb' Ich Mich"; Charles M. Loeffler's eight-part chorus, a capella, "For One Who Fell in Battle," after the poem of T. W. Parsons; "Tomorrow," trio for women's voices (first time), Arthur Foote; "Spring Delight," Cui; hunting song, Benedict; Netherland folksong, arranged by Kremer.

The accompanist for the two solo performers was Kurt Schindler. Mme. Gluck's selections included the following: Rosignols amoureaux, Rameau; La Colomba, Schindler; Warnung, Mozart; Song of the Shepherd Lehl, and Chant Hindu, Rimsky-Korsakoff; My Laddie, Thayer.

Mr. Slezak's pieces included Narrative of Assad from Goldmark's opera, "The Queen of Sheba," Verschwiegene Liebe, Hugo Wolf; Die Loreley, Liszt; Ashes of Roses, Huntington Woodman; Ecstasy, Walter Morse Rummel.

Cecilian enthusiasm is a special and rare thing. It is an artistic possession of the city which has been highly prized in the past and will be again highly prized in the future, when music values are brought into perspective and adjustment. Cecilian enthusiasm was at its top mark in the performance of the Arthur Foote trio, a little piece of remarkable sincerity and beauty. The citizens of the musical city of tomorrow will not be found to have forgotten this music. They will exalt it as one of their genuine examples of self-expression. Americans of today are disappointed that their composers do not produce something big to scare the world into recognition of them. They think that nothing but a dreadnought symphony will suffice to give them room among the musical nations. The Germans move against us with their prodigious symphonic poems, the Italians advance on us in the dazzling panoply of veristic opera, and we seek our hiding-places. We cannot be musical, we say to ourselves, in the face of all that. But we are musical and in a way to make the other nationalities pay attention to us, if only we were not abashed by certain unessential comparisons. The little choral trio of Mr. Foote is an American piece of music and a noble one, even if it is small; and the Cecilia singers know it is. Honor, then, to Cecilian enthusiasm. Honor to the little art group that stays out in the open when the European art legions appear.

The society gave itself a concert in bringing the two Metropolitan opera artists into the program. The members should have left their places on the platform and gone into the auditorium to hear Mr. Slezak's "Loreley" and Mme. Gluck's "Lass with a Delicate Air." There was plenty of room for them. Mme. Gluck made her first really impressive appearance in Boston at this concert. She is one of the great sopranos who have sung in the city in the season of 1911-12. Her beautiful voice and facile technique will call out the matinee crowds in a few years. She can do the hard things. The music of Rameau proved that. If opera in English comes to be the fashion in America, as so many patriotic musicians promise, Mme. Gluck will have her opportunity to win the first of prima donna honors.

The Cecilians had an audience in agreement with their Americanism and appreciative of their brilliant soloists. The two American composers represented on the program, Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Foote, were in the house and acknowledged the applause that was left over after the chorus and the conductor had taken what was theirs. The visiting artists gave good measure of fine singing by adding applause numbers to their contract list.

NEW YORK—Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for three years and who is to leave soon to take up other work in Europe, made his final appearance here at Carnegie hall at an evening concert by the Boston musicians.

When he first appeared on the stage the retiring conductor was fairly overwhelmed by long-continued and spontaneous handclapping. The musical director will lead Saturday's Boston Symphony matinee, which marks his last professional appearance here.

GLOBE, MARCH 22, 1912.

CECILIA CONCERT.

Chorus in Better Traits Than Its Conductor.

Mme Gluck and Mr Slezak Soloists, With Honors to Former.

The Cecilia Society gave the second and last concert of its season at Symphony Hall last night. Mme Alma Gluck soprano and Lee Slezak tenor assisted, both of the Metropolitan Opera House. John P. Marshall was the organist. The program gave the names of two accompanists, Maestro Fernando Tanara and Benjamin Guckenberger. Kurt Schindler, conductor of the MacDowell Chorus of New York, accompanied the songs sung by Mme Gluck and Mr Slezak. Arthur Mees was the conductor.

The feature of the choral singing was Mr Loeffler's eight-part unaccompanied chorus, "For One Who Fell in Battle," words by T. W. Parsons, dedicated to Maj Henry L. Higginson, in memory of his comrades who never returned from the war. This music has been sung in Boston by the Choral Club, and was given in New York by Mr Schindler's chorus, March 16, a year ago.

The feminine ending of the three lines of the refrain, or burden of each stanza, are not conducive to easy musical treatment, but Mr Loeffler, while making the continuity and flow of his music atone for the text, and while writing as the masterly contrapuntist, has found marked spontaneity and invention. One might suppose that expressive melody and a harmonic design, possessing both character and individuality, found no embarrassment in deporting themselves according to the laws of musical science. There was cordial applause, redoubled and prolonged when Mr Loeffler rose from his seat in the orchestra and twice bowed his acknowledgment.

Arthur Foote also was present to receive the tokens of pleasure of the audience at his trio for women's voices, a cappella, "Tomorrow," a less pretentious work, but gracefully and expressively written, suitably varied to the three stanzas in choice of harmony and with a hint at sequence of figures to afford variety to strict polyphony.

The program stated that this was the first performance in Boston of the trio, as of a chorus in eight parts a cappella, by Cornelius, and of Bach's motet, "Praise Ye the Yord, All Ye Heathen," a noble piece of counterpoint in which Mr Marshall played the figured bass on the organ, and added all parts in the choral.

The singing of the Cecilia Society habitually has been marked by the beauty in the tonal quality of its voices, nor should one say that last night's performance was an exception. The contralto and bass choirs are particularly well composed. During the first part of the program the singing of the sopranos tended to be thin in quality and to be a shade low in pitch. There was not perfect agreement in intonation in either Verdi's beautiful hymn to the Virgin Mary or the part song by Cornelius.

Mr Loeffler's intricate and highly exacting chorus was well sung. It had evidently claimed particular attention of chorus and conductor. There was also intelligence and unanimity in Mr Foote's trio, and in a grateful part song, "Spring Delight," by Cui, but the performance as a whole was without distinction, without the subtlety in nuance and in plasticity of rhythm, without the varied accentuation of the text and distinctness in its delivery, which form the basis of rhetorical expression and finesse in a choral ensemble.

These are qualities which can spring from but one source—the conductor. Mr Mees is a man of a wide range of musical learning, and he gives evidence of being a conscientious drillmaster, but he lacks authority, imagination and personal magnetism as a conductor. His beat is that expansive type of beckoning in which the stroke or rhythmical pulse may occur at any one of several seconds. It is a beat incessant in left hand as in right and tires both singers and audience. Security of attack and clarity in the florid passages was lacking in the Bach motet. There was no reason evident to a hearer how the singers could feel an authoritative, buoyant sense of rhythm, as though the music bore along the chorus, rather than being laboriously propelled by it.

The Cecilia deserves high praise for the manner in which it acquitted itself last night. The society has been endeavoring to strengthen its forces and enlarge interest. It has the well-wishes toward that end of every sincere lover of good music in Boston. Its chief care has been the search for the right conductor. The performances by Mr Mees do not indicate his possession of the qualities demanded by the true interpreter of choral music. It is true there is a dearth of conductors who are born for their work, who do not assume the birthright.

The feature of the performance was the singing of Mme Gluck, and it cannot receive the attention it deserves this morning. Her pure lyric soprano voice, the unerring intelligence and musical taste which she displayed in its use, the simplicity and unspoiled charm of her stage presence, all caused true enjoyment. Every song in her two groups had inherent value, and each was for her, within the range of her best endeavor. It would be a pleasure to speak further of some of them, as the quaint and pretty artifice in Rameau's Rossignols a moureux, Mr Schindler's plaintive and graceful La Colomba (redemanded), Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful Chant Hindu, Paladilhe's Psyche and Thayer's "My Laddie," a song with popular appeal without a touch of the commonplace. Mme Gluck's diction, as usual, was excellent. She gave to her songs their true atmosphere and added repeated encores.

Mr Slezak gave little indication of the qualities that made his recent recital one of unusual interest. His selections were most unhappily chosen. The air of Assad, the beloved of Sulamith, in Goldmark's opera, upon the jealous Queen of Sheba does not reward curiosity. A song by Hugo Wolf, Verschwiegene Liebe, has good points. Die Loreley preferably is for a woman, and two additions in English, by Woodman and Rummel, were the veriest lush, as was an encore, also about "roses." The tenor bawled more than he sang, holding on to high notes interminably, to the riotous joy of the audience. He was rewarded by repeated encores. Mr Schindler accompanied with admirable taste. There was an audience of good size.

ADVERTISER, MARCH 22, 1912

SECOND CONCERT OF CECILIA SOCIETY

MME. ALMA GLUCK A DELIGHTFUL SOLOIST

So Also Was Leo Slezak, and Mr. Mees Conducted With Splendid Appreciation of the Compositions

Last evening in Symphony hall, the Cecilia society, Dr. Arthur Mees, conductor, gave the second concert of this, the 36th, season. The soloists were: Mme. Alma Gluck, soprano, and Mr. Leo Slezak, tenor. Mr. John P. Marshall was organist. Mr. Kurt Schindler, accompanist.

Altogether it was an extremely interesting and varied programme, containing as it did three compositions that were marked "first performance," two compositions by Boston composers, soloists of first rank, and last but not least the good work of the society.

The recent visit of the Toronto choir revealed possibilities in the art of choral singing of which the majority of concert-goers were unaware. It is a fact patent to all, that we have not reached the standard of the Canadians in this branch of musical art. When the choruses of this country are willing to submit to the taxing regime necessary to this end we may reasonably hope to compete with the aforenamed organization. The material vocally is at hand. The skill of a conductor alone is not sufficient. Rigid voice examinations at frequent intervals and endless rehearsals are not only effective but necessary to reach the highest plane of excellence. Is there a body of singers in Boston willing to undergo these demands?

The Cecilia society last night did some excellent work. There were times, as for instance in the "Hymn to the Virgin Mary" and "Spring Delight," when the ensemble was extremely enjoyable and effective. The difficulties in Mr. Loeffler's piece were met with startling ease and good intonation. We understand that this work has been revised since its first performance by the Choral Art society a few years ago. It is intrinsically beautiful, harmonically and melodically, and the interpretation convincing. We are under the impression that the "motet" of Bach would have been more effective if it had been placed later on the programme. Coming at the beginning the voices of the singers seemed to lack a tonicity of voice which caused the roulades to become slightly blurred. Fine diction and excellent enunciation and exceptional quality of the sopranos marked the singing of Mr. Foote's fine trio for women's voices.

Of the work of the soloists it is hard to say which was the favorite with the audience, as the reception given each was equally warm and enthusiastic. Mr. Slezak was in prime vocal condition and gave great pleasure with his splendid vocal equipment. In his recent song recital here he displayed his ability as a singer of songs. Again last night he disproved the theory that operatic singers are unsuccessful and ineffective on the concert platform. In the group of songs, Mr. Slezak sang the song by Wolf with good taste. "Die Lorely" was somewhat fragmentarily sung. In this song the atmosphere was lacking. He was not strictly in the spirit of the text. The climaxes of the two English songs were broadly sustained with powerful and thrilling tones. In these songs Mr. Slezak's English diction was excellent. Of itself the aria from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba" does not hold interest. It does not make a quick appeal to the average listener. Mr. Slezak made much of the aria by reason of his dramatic intensity. His fine broad phrasing must be commended. He was heartily applauded for his work and was obliged to sing several encores.

Mme. Gluck's beautiful voice is not powerful, but her artistry makes one lose sight of this fact. It is purely lyric. She has not a great variety of tone color at her command. She makes her songs interesting by virtue of her wealth of vocal technique and exquisite purity of tone combined with a sincere and unaffected manner. She has that indefinable something known as magnetism. She sang the song by Rameau with faultless technique. The roulades, trills and vocal embellishments with which this song abounds were sung with clearness, smoothness and ease. Great finish and rare delicacy of tone marked her singing of "La Colomba." As an encore Mme. Gluck sang "The Lass with a delicate air" with fitting simplicity. The songs in her second group were by far more interesting. With these Mme. Gluck made a deep impression by reason of her splendid interpretations. The "Song of the Shepherd Lehl" is intrinsically charming and beautiful. The haunting melody and the loveliness of Mme. Gluck's voice made the "Chant Hindu" something to be remembered. The song by Paladilhe was sung with fine feeling. We have no doubt that the song "My Laddie" by Thayer will, by virtue of its obvious sentiment and attractiveness, become popular.

Dr. Mees conducted with spirit. To him is due praise for the fine showing made by the chorus last night. He is fortunate in the quality of the voices at his command. A few more men, especially tenors (rara avis) are needed and would give a better balance to the organization. At present the sopranl and alti are in all points superior to the men singers.

There were calls for Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Foote, both of whom were present and acknowledged the hearty applause which their names called forth from the audience.

That the Cecilia society is holding its own with the Boston public was shown by the large and enthusiastic audience of last evening.

F. M. W.

[165]

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 7, 1912

WEINGARTNER, COMPOSER

HIS NEW SYMPHONY TO BE HEARD TOMORROW

The First Performances Here at the Symphony Concerts—The Viennese Suggestion—The Clear Influence of Bruckner—Waltz Rhythms and the General Handling

A NEW YORK publication recently introduced an article by Weingartner with some prefatory remarks in which it was made to seem, as far as possible, that Weingartner writes music as modern but not so illsounding as that of the bold, bad Richard Strauss; the anonymous editor did not hesitate to imply that the works of the former in general, and his new third symphony in particular, would survive those of the latter because of a happy conjunction, which this editor seemed to perceive very plainly, between ultra-modern (i. e. Straussian) treatment and the "classical ideal." It is therefore fortunate that we Bostonians are about to hear the new composition, not only because we may possibly learn from it how to fill old bottles with new wine, but because it is seldom that we have the privilege of beholding a work of art which in adapting the discoveries of somebody else than its creator is more epoch-making than its prototype. We do not esteem the Russian "National Five" because they succeeded in establishing their "school," we rather forgive them for inflicting upon us their pupils because they themselves wrote well. Those of us who enjoy the music of Wagner or Brahms do not usually care for that of their followers.

There are a very few people who both compose and conduct excellently; there are more who do one but not the other well. The born conductor composing is likely to resemble the secondary current of an induction coil; the strength will be partly determined by the strength of the primary current and partly by the number of turns in the secondary coil, but the direction will be absolutely determined by that of the primary current. In the same way, the interest of your kapellmeister piece depends partly on the composer's own gifts and partly on whether he is fortunate in his choice of a model, but the quality of his ideas and style is entirely predestined by his forerunner.

The man, however, who follows closely upon the heels of the fellow who is really clearing the path has an easy task in winning popular favor. The musical innovator is blackguarded now for his latest heresies; five, ten, or fifty years hence the public will have accepted them as dogmas, but the innovator will still be blackguarded because he will have progressed to new heresies. Here is the golden opportunity for the disciple; adopting the accepted earlier manner of the still hated innovator, he produces a highly proper yet up-to-date pot-boiler, and is hailed forthwith as the man of the hour. It takes cleverness of a sort to do this—for instance, in view of the unpopularity in Germany of Massenet, Puccini, and Strauss, it was shrewd of d'Albert to realize that the synthesis in his opera, "Izeyl" of the plot of "Thais," the melody of "Bohème," and the harmony (considerably watered, to be sure) of "Salome" was bound to succeed in the cities which had eschewed the works from which the opera was compiled; this kind of ability, however, is not to be confounded with artistic genius.

Mr. Weingartner's symphony, we are told, portrays the life and spirit of Vienna; the work, however, is not minutely programmatic, and one can hear in it as much local color as one pleases. The first movement opens, after a short introduction of two measures, with a theme for 'cellos, accompanied by violins in thirds tremolo, which resemble in style and general treatment the opening theme of Bruckner's seventh symphony; as in the latter, wind instruments answer the 'cellos and then a return to the tonic key reintroduces the theme in a higher octave with somewhat fuller accompaniment. Some counterpoint in Bruckner's manner leads by a transitional theme to the second principal theme, and after long development of this last there is a more energetic concluding theme; but not even the very Brucknerian climax can suppress a new "control" which has been asserting its malign influence with increasing force ever since the transition, and which now declares itself frankly, in the codetta, as Strauss of the "Don Juan" period, and which is not shaken even by the appearance of certain use of the harps in a way hitherto employed only by Mahler. The long development is conventional in its employment of the figure-by-figure plan, and the recapitulation is more nearly literal than is usually the case nowadays. Near the close both the principal themes are heard together.

The second movement, except for a short introduction in two-four time which is quoted towards the end, is in waltz-rhythm throughout. The main theme is full of harmonic shifts designed to give a whimsical character to the movement, but it seems to me that the theme remains heavy none the less, the rhythm lifeless and the harmonies both artificial and obvious. There is long development and playing with the theme and subsidiary material, much as in the Bruckner scherzos. The theme of the trio is very Brucknerian in character. The return of the first part introduces nothing unexpected.

The slow movement is based upon two principal themes, the one a choral-like period for bass, followed by a less severe but still solemn response by strings and woodwind, all obviously derived from Bruckner's slow movements; the second a close imitation, as successful in manner as unsuccessful in matter, of a passage from Mahler's sixth symphony. There is no development as such, but the themes are elaborated upon their return, and are finally heard together.

It is the finale in which Weingartner quotes and uses extensively a theme from the "Fledermaus." The movement is in two parts, a sort of condensed sonata form and a long waltz in which many themes are combined. The first part possesses little distinction; the waltz is more ingratiating, but it must be admitted that Weingartner does the same sort of thing better in his paraphrase of the "Invitation to the Dance," wherein all the themes instead of only one are furnished him by somebody else.

The whole symphony gives me the impression of having been written more because Mr. Weingartner was able to write it than because he had to do so; there is everywhere evidence of great facility, but there is little or no drive back of this surface productivity. The themes will possibly appeal to some as "tunes"—i. e. as collections of notes carefully phrased off into groups of four measures; but of "melody" in the sense of warmly emotional instrumental song there is none in the work. The themes seem to me to be lacking in spontaneity and therefore in sincerity; it is as though they had been constructed to follow a successful model rather than composed to express a genuine state of feeling. The harmonies have general lack distinction; bizarre and artificial changes alternate with the most trite and played-out stock progressions, but the former give no impression of originality, nor the latter of reserve. The orchestration has analogous failings; it is sonorous and euphonious, but there is little individualization of the instrumental tone-colors, while the doubling and grouping is such that a clever conductor could reduce the wind instruments by a fifth without exciting the suspicion of an audience, because the extra instruments are not heard as characteristic. The formal treatment is heavy, pinning faith rather on adherence to rule-of-thumb precepts than to closely knit organic structure in the attempt to preserve coherence; the lengthy literal recapitulations, so far from rounding out the form, weaken them with tautology, while the practice of uniting the principal themes at the close of a movement—the only "departure" from convention used—is so worked to death that its at best artificial effect becomes very tiresome. Finally, the continual imitation of Bruckner's manner, executed as it is without Bruckner's grandeur of thought but with a sophistication of procedure which makes the naive Bruckner's mode of speech seem highly affected and hypocritical, is unfortunate from both the artistic and the ethical standpoint.

However, the symphony fortunately does not need such help as it might derive from a little more intrinsic merit. The favorable testimony of, say, a distinguished clergyman who knows absolutely nothing of chemistry will sell thousands of bottles of some worthless patent medicine; and we may be sure that the fact that Mr. Weingartner is one of the greatest living conductors will induce in a large portion of his audience a feeling of awe which will effectually inhibit such sacrilege as a critical analysis.

P. G.

Old Scores and New Methods

We read in Boston newspapers that Fiedler doubled the horns and the other wind instruments in a recent performance of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. No doubt the first movement seemed thin to Mr. Fiedler, or he believed that the announcement of the Fate theme would be more portentous if proclaimed by eight horns and four bassoons. But why double the passages suggestive of happiness, according to Tschaikowsky's own programme, be thus thrown out of proportion and seem still thinner, almost inconsequential? Conductors in many cases now double the wood-wind in symphonies of Haydn, Mozart and even Beethoven. Thus they strive to procure a better balance. Would it not be better to double the strings, and keep the wind instruments as the composer indicated? The symphonies of Haydn, and Mozart should be played in a small hall. As they are usually played, with sixteen first violins and other strings in proportion and with wood-wind doubled, they seem swollen; they lose much grace, vivacity, charm. [The New York Review.

Items of the Day

Mr. Fiedler will repeat Strauss's 'Sinfonia Domestica,' which he first put on his programmes two seasons ago, at the Symphony Concerts of next week.

HERALD, MARCH 8, 1912.

Maud Powell a Suffragette? Certainly Not, Says Husband

Miss Maud Powell.

Violinist Too Busy with Her Music to Stop to Deny Stories.

PREPARING NEW CONCERTO

"She is not a suffragette!"

This fact was authoritatively stated yesterday with emphasis on the "not" by H. Godfrey Turner, husband and manager of the distinguished violinist, Miss Maud Powell, who will be heard in Boston this afternoon.

"She hasn't time to be," continued Mr. Turner, who, owing to a protracted rehearsal, was courteously endeavoring to satisfy the importunate and persistent reporter. "She has been associated with suffragettes a good deal, and as a result of our bringing two over from England she has been referred to as an ardent supporter of the cause. So far we've never even taken the trouble to deny it.

"Of course, it's all right for some women, Nordica, for instance; she's rich and can afford to have outside interests, and Mrs. Langtry, that poor old beauty! Then there are some women, who positively must have an outlet, to whom suffrage is a godsend. I've seen processions of them in London, creatures who could not get any one to marry them, with thin wisps of hair pulled back in hard knots, huddled up in awful brown ulsters so that one could scarcely tell which was the back and which was the front.

"Yes, suffrage is good enough for t[he] vote had better be taken away from the negroes before it's given to women.

"It's something to be able to say that this woman is an American," went on Mr. Turner, waving his hand enthusiastically in the direction of his wife. "And do you realize too that this is her ninth consecutive season in this country and that next year is already booked far ahead. And so Miss Powell is an exception to the old adage, 'A prophet is not without honor save in his own country.'

"Of course, I take great care of her," Mr. Turner proceeded to explain proudly. "I always try not to have her play more than three times a week, and she never arrives in a town later than 12 o'clock on the day of a concert. She puts in only three or four hours a week of actual practice, but mentally she never stops.

"All this talk of 'greatest' seems to me very vulgar. Who can say whether Ysaye or Kreisler is the greater. It is merely a matter of individuality. As for competition, it's the duffers who kill the great ones. A second rate violinist, who plays an uninteresting program badly, will do more to harm the attention at fiddle concerts than a constant succession of fine artists."

But Miss Powell is not merely an American violinist. She has many interests and activities, a keen power of observation and an undaunted fearlessness in the expression of intelligently formed opinions.

Besides being the founder of the Maud Powell quartet, which is said to be the first female quartet to have been established in this country, she has been the means of presenting many new compositions to the American public. She admits that the violinist's field for selection of interesting works is limited, while in a recent interview she intimated that Elgar's much discussed concerto was to her mind emptiness and vanity. A new composition soon to be played by her is a concerto by Coleridge-Taylor.

MARCH 16, 1912.

PIANIST BACHAUS MAKES DEBUT AS A SYMPHONY SOLOIST

JOURNAL—

Wilhelm Bachaus, who has been a prominent piano player in Europe since he was 16 years of age, which was in 1900, made his debut as a Symphony soloist yesterday afternoon, playing Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. He scored an unquestioned success in the presence of one of the largest audiences of the season.

The orchestra was paid a similar compliment following the performance of Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which tells all about "papa, mama and the baby." But the loudest and longest applause of all come after the orchestra had played Weber's "Der Freischuetz" overture—the queen of overtures, as Berlioz called it—in the most sparkling fashion.

The orchestra will be away next week on a tour which will signalize Mr. Fiedler's farewell to all the cities outside of Boston. There was a touch of parting enthusiasm in the unusual applause that greeted the conductor when he appeared yesterday.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 9, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A LONG, NEW SYMPHONY FROM MR. WEINGARTNER

The Conductor as Composer—His Rhetorical Resources and Skill—The Contrasting Substance — The Viennese Note — The Keen Interest of It All—Miss Powell Plays Sibelius's Violin Concerto Out of the Exotic North

BECAUSE Mr. Weingartner is a very eminent conductor, and because of late the musical public of Boston has found him also a very interesting "personality," the cynics have been saying for a week past that the audience at the Symphony Concert yesterday would applaud his new symphony and profess a lively curiosity over it whether it was good, bad or indifferent. The listeners on Friday afternoon did hear it with a pleasant eagerness and applaud it with a pleasant heartiness—once indeed at a mighty climax that did not, as they mistakenly believed, end the slow movement. By so much, the predictions of the cynics, who think but poorly of Mr. Weingartner as a composer, were fulfilled. On the other hand, it is quite possible to carry too far the belief, supported though it is by many examples, that mistrusts the conductor, who would be composer as well. The interpretative and the recreating faculty is one thing; the creative and inventive faculty is another; and very rarely do the twain meet in a Richard Strauss who is both eminent conductor and eminent composer. Yet when this belief hardens into a prejudice and sets some listeners down before a new symphony or a new tone-poem by Mr. Weingartner, firmly convinced that the music cannot be interesting, they fail to keep the openness of mind that is a condition precedent to understanding and appreciation and they do the composer manifest injustice. And every new symphony need not and cannot be what the Germans call a "classic master-work."

Mr. Weingartner's "Viennese" symphony in E major, heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, is not a masterpiece—probably he himself has no illusions on that score—but it is often interesting music and as often it bears the clear marks of his supple and fascinating mind and personality. Not for nothing has Mr. Weingartner, these many years, studied the music of all times and schools and conducted in it in opera-house and concert-room. Not for nothing has he an unusually sensitive and assimilative mind, that responds to many impulses and holds fast to what has touched it. To say this is not to say that Mr. Weingartner's symphony is "reminiscent" in the conventional sense of the word, but inevitably in his studies and conducting, he has become familiar with all sorts of melodic, harmonic and instrumental procedure, until he readily commands and applies it. The truer saying is that Mr. Weingartner is now a master of musical rhetoric and that he has applied his knowledge and skill to the utmost in this new symphony. It has been said that there is everything in it from figures that suggest Haydn to Brucknerian crescendos and Debussyan progressions. There is, if the listener has the mind that fastens upon what he is pleased to call "reminiscence." But all this is the common heritage of the composer of 1912, and, besides, the new symphony contains something in its own right.

On the rhetorical side, however, the music is most interesting. Mr. Weingartner has written it richly, full-throatedly, with keen sense of the songful, the harmonic, the rhythmic and the colorful possibilities of the full and reenforced modern orchestra. On this score, at least, he is of kin to Rachmaninoff and Elgar. Like most of his contemporaries, he likes the higher and the sharper tones of the violins and uses them wherever he would have incisiveness or agitation. Like them, he knows and uses the deep and songful richness of the lower-voiced strings. In true Viennese fashion he loves the embroidery that flutes and clarinets may lightly and brightly weave; he is quick to utilize the penetrating song of the oboe, and the rich intensities, glowing or shadowed, of the horns. He appreciates his trumpets, though he does not use them flamboyantly, and to the sonorities of his trombones—and indeed of the whole orchestra—he adds rather superfluously, at the climax of his adagio, the great voice of the organ. Yet he keeps his tonal mass and his instrumental coloring diverse. It is full, even thick, or else sharp and nervous, in the dramatic and agitated first movement; it is shadowed and songful in the slow movement; and oftenest light and bright in the scherzo and the finale. Mr. Weingartner distributes his melodies and his ornament, and makes his transitions in the choirs or the individual voices where they will most tell. He does all this felicitously and significantly, with artistry and imagination. Even the variations of the finale are colorful counterpoint.

Throughout the symphony Mr. Weingartner plies all the arts of the musical rhetorician. The preparation for the waltz with which the symphony ends is ingenuous and titillating. The waltz itself is less an intricate and inarticulate "symphonic waltz" than a frank and pleasurably invented Viennese dancing time that gains by its candor and its innocence of sophistication. The preceding variations are artful, if sometimes more reflective than fanciful. In the slow movement, Mr. Weingartner is a master of the long-breathed, slowly gathering, broadening and breaking Brucknerian crescendo. The whole orchestra rolls upward; the climax spreads itself upon the air; then the strings upbear the song shimmeringly or the horns begin to cast their shadows over it. Artfully, too, Mr. Weingartner varies the musical thoughts of this slow movement; they are grave and sober; brooding and shadowed; broken, tremulous, upsoaring; or they suffuse the orchestra at the end with humorous glamor. The design is rhetorical, Brucknerian, if you will; but the "effect" tells. Brucknerian, too, is the heavy beat, the thick tone, the pleasant jollity of parts of the scherzo, and rhetorically true and telling at least, are the quickly contrasting passages, clear, light, graceful, fanciful. Again, as the contemporary symphonists like to do, Mr. Weingartner would dramatize his first movement. There is struggle between his musical thoughts; there is songful triumph, and he conducts the struggle after the ways of present musical rhetoric. He overlooks not one of them—the telling pause, the restricted rhythmic beat, the cumulative chords, the slithering progressiveness, the nervous instrumental tremors, the slowly exacting songful sweetness. At the very start he arrests the hearer's attention and draws him into the struggle. At the beginning of each movement, as well, a little glance backward, he so catches and interests him.

So much for the artistry and the rhetoric of the new symphony. They are steadily interesting and often distinguished, while time and again, especially in the lighter movements, they bear the marks of Mr. Weingartner's alert, graceful, easily and unaffectedly brilliant mind and personality. Admittedly his musical ideas in their naked selves are less distinctive and interesting. They do not seize the ear and the imagination; they are not kindling and engrossing as he develops and makes play with them. They seem evolved and serviceable musical thoughts meet for the engrossing rhetorical treatment they are to receive. It is the contemporary way with themes and nobody is likely to quote Mr. Weingartner's for the stimulation, though possibly for the admonition of another generation of composers. Mr. Weingartner does not find the symphonic form stubborn to his ideas and purposes. He moves freely in it, but it would not be the truth to say that the development of his themes is profound, individually inventive or poetically imaginative. The rhetorical treatment is the glamorous cloak of excellent workmanship.

Mr. Weinartner has given no hint of a "programme" for the symphony. Yet he has permitted it to be labelled "Viennese"; and he has not denied that the temperament of the Viennese folk and a characterizing suggestion of Vienna lived play in the moods of the music. Of such, then, as the Viennese musical action goes, is the waltz of the finale and the insistent waltz rhythms in the scherzo. Of such may also be the Brucknerian jolity of parts of the same scherzo and the lightness of the contrasting passages. (Behold the Viennese at play in their fields). Viennese, perhaps, too, is the Brucknerian note of grave exaltation in the slow movement; and if the first movement is restless and tumultuous, so also has Vienna been known to be. There is a grave as well as a gay Kaiserstadt.

The symphony filled a full hour and the other two pieces on the programme made due contrast to it. Smetana's overture to his operatic comedy, "The Bartered Bride," ended the concert in lively fashion, and perhaps left the thought that Bohemian folk-tunes and a simple, spontaneous, vivacious imagination in a composer have their place and their fruits in music no less than the reflection, the resource and the rhetoric of the astute and "mental" Weingartner. Between the symphony and the overture Miss Powell, returning to the Symphony Concerts after five years, played Sibelius's concerto for violin and orchestra, or rather his tone-poem in which the violin is the particularly penetrating voice. Miss Powell is mistress of the technical exactions in which this other Northern concerto matches Tschaikowsky's. She commanded them so completely that the listeners unless they happened to know the music, were probably unaware of their existence. She is mistress, too, of the peculiarly incisive tone, as of a single bitter-sweet and penetrating voice that much of the concerto demands. She has also the grim energy of accomplishment that bears the finale forward to the end, and her temperament responds quickly to the moods of Sibelius in the piece and the concise and grave expression he has given of them.

We cannot all be Finns, or know our Finland, though the "nationalists" in music would have us change our country and recompose our point of view with the shift of race and land in each composer. The learned programmist may instruct us briefly in the physiognomy of Finland and of the Finnish spirit and suggest their play upon and in Sibelius. We may have these hints, but we must listen to this concerto for what it is and what it bears in itself. The reticent energy, the grim terseness of the music are a pleasure to hear in these days of musical prolixity and effusiveness. Its sharpness of voice and its sombre coloring are the northern exoticism that now tempts us because our musical palates are sated with other exoticisms. On the other hand, it is as easy to resent the inability or the refusal of Sibelius to coördinate his solo violin with the orchestra. He works with his solo instrument and he works with his band; but less often does he make fusing or contrasting play with both. And, as he often lacks diversity of color in his music, so he keeps the iolin too insistently in its upper ranges and the orchestra too insistently making sombre backgrounds. In mood, emotion, poetic quality, the concerto stirs the imagination. It is grim and sombre; it is melancholy or plaintive; it marches Viking-like, or it whistles as with the easy voices of the air. It is sharply stinging, with the prick of its harmonics, or it tempts by the exotic beauty of its bitter-sweet song. But never quite do the brooding clouds lift from it. The fitful sun only half shines through, and the energy it kindles dies in grim shadow again. Sibelius is not for all tastes; he is for many young enthusiasms.

H. T. P.

AMERICAN—

MARCH 10, 1912.

BACHAUS THE SOLOIST.

Will Play Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto at Symphony Concert.

Since he has been in Boston Mr. Fiedler has made it a rule to play the principal tone poems of Strauss every other year. Almost exactly two years ago he played the Symphonia Domestica, which two years before that had been introduced to Boston by Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler has placed this work on next season's Symphony programmes, and it is likely that this will be the last important performance of Strauss we will have under his direction.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the eminent German pianist, who is making his first tour of America, will be the soloist. Some weeks ago Mr. Bachaus made his debut in Boston in recital and disclosed high qualities of musicianship in his playing. He will play here the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. The programme begins with the "Der Freischuts" Overture of Weber.

POST, MARCH 9, 1912

WEINGARTNER ON PROGRAMME

His 3d Symphony Played for First Time Here

BY OLIN DOWNES

For some reason, Felix Weingartner's Third Symphony was played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. The work is grandiose and empty like a shell. The mountains labor terribly, and some a mouse! Alas! Such pages of golden orchestration gone to waste—although even in this respect, it is open to question whether the conductor-composer has used his army of instruments to the utmost advantage. For it certainly seemed in many a place that as brilliant results could have been secured with lesser effort on the part of the players who toiled so long and so hard. The symphony has a brave exterior, and above all is said.

The color is so striking at times that it arrests the ear, and there are some harmonic progressions, some excellent contrapuntal writing, which in themselves stand as examples of virtuoso composition. Then the ears become surfeited with the constant clogging tone, the attention wanders, the composer is still saying nothing at all with distressing good will and complete lack of ideas. The piece is a virtuoso composition for orchestra.

The slow movement pleased most yesterday, by reason of its sustained and sonorous character, enforced by the organ. There was cordial applause for a fine performance, to the preparation of which Mr. Fiedler had devoted all possible thought and energy.

Maud Powell Soloist

Maud Powell gave relief with the fine violin concerto of Sibelius, a work, indeed, well worth re-introducing in Boston after the first performance by Miss Powell, under Dr. Muck, in 19[illegible]. Neither the form nor the style of this composition is iconoclastic, and yet how rich it is in ideas, how noble is its appeal! And how refreshingly, though doubtless often in a manner very taxing to the soloist, does the composer write for the solo instrument. It is seen that within fairly orthodox limits he has found something quite his own, of much interest and of striking adaptability to its idioms. The slender violin becomes now and again epic in its expression. Each string has a heart, each register is a due revelation of especial tonal and emotional qualities. Great ideas make their style before them. As a result of Sibelius' style, he has written something between a rhapsody and a concerto for his virtuoso to perform. An exceptionally prominent part in the development and transformation of themes falls to the violin. Although the work is difficult, it is surprising that more virtuosi do not take up this work.

Miss Powell was applauded with the greatest enthusiasm and recalled many times. In the first movement she was hampered by the fact that the orchestra and the soloist, whosever the fault, were not wholly at one. As Miss Powell gained her grip, she played with much more fire and authority. In the rondo she excelled. Few women violinists have such a tone; fewer still have such artistic perception behind it.

Rare Tonal Beauty

Miss Powell is now at her maturity as an artist, and with her her audience enjoy the fruit of years of labor and the self-development still more essential for great playing. Miss Powell will probably play more brilliantly this winter than she did yesterday afternoon, yet her performance was not only remarkable for tonal beauty and emotional appeal, but for artistic proportion and balance that held the piece splendidly together, refined and ennobled passages that some may have thought over barbaric, a performance in a word which did admirable justice to the composer and to the performer.

The concert came to an end with the brisk and delightful playing of some of the finest comedy music since Mozart—Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

POST,

MARCH 10, 191[illegible]

Nine[illegible] Symphony Programme

Since he has been in Boston Mr. Fiedler has made it a rule to play the principal tone poems of Strauss every other year. Almost exactly two years ago he played the Symphonia Domestica, which two years before that had been introduced to Boston by Dr. Muck.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the eminent German pianist, who is making his first tour of America, will be the soloist. Some weeks ago Mr. Bachaus made his debut in Boston in recital and disclosed high qualities of musicianship in his playing. He will play here the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven with which he has won great praise in New York. The programme begins with the "Der Freischutz" Overture of Weber, after which will come the Concerto, and the programme will end with the "Domestica."

[166]

2, 1912

RTNER

GRAMME

phony Played

Time Here

N DOWNES

n, Felix Weingartner's vas played for the first esterday afternoon at al of the Boston Symn Symphony Hall. The
and empty like a shell.
or terribly, and scarce
Such pages of golden e to waste—although,
ct, it is open to quesconductor-composer has instruments to the ut-
For it certainly seemed that as brilliant result secured with lesser ef-of the players who d so hard. The symve exterior, and about triking at times that r, and there are some ons, some excellent

g, which in themselves
s of virtuoso composi-eams become surfeited clogging tone, the at-
the composer is felt,
t all with distressing
omplete lack of ideas.
irtuoso composition for

ment pleased most yes-n of its sustained and er, enforced by the or-cordial applause for a
to the preparation of
had devoted all possi-energy.

Powell Soloist

ave relief with the fine f Sibelius, a work, in-re-introducing in Bosperformance by Miss
Dr. Muck, in 1907.
nor the style of this iconoclastic, and yet ideas, how noble is its w refreshingly, though n a manner very taxing oes the composer write rument. It is seen that rthodox limits he has quite his own, of much striking adaptability to slender violin becomes epic in its expression.
a heart, each register on of especial tonal and lea. Great ideas make re them. As a result e, he has written some-
a rhapsody and a saga to perform. An except-nt part in the developormation of themes goes though the work is dif-prising that more vir-
e up this work.
was applauded with the asm and recalled many first movement she was fact that the orchestra
whosever the fault,
at one. As Miss Powell
o, she played with the uthority. In the romanza Few women violinists
; fewer still have such on behind it.

Tonal Beauty

now at her maturity
d with her her audience of years of labor and ment still more essential ng. Miss Powell will ore brilliantly this evendid yesterday afternoon,
nance was not only retonal beauty and emo-ut for artistic proportion t held the piece splendidly and ennobled measures have thought over bar-
nance in a word which justice to the composer ormer.
ame to an end with the ithful playing of some of dy music since Mozart-ture to "The Bartered

CH 10, 1912

mphony Programme

en in Boston Mr. Fiedrule to play the prinof Strauss every other ctly two years ago he onia Domestica, which that had been intro-
y Dr. Muck. us, the eminent Gero is making his first will be the soloist. Some Bachaus made his debut ital and disclosed high olanship in his playing.
e the "Emperor" Con-
en with which he has e in New York. The s with the "Der Freiof Weber, after which Concerto, and the pro-with the "Domestica."

MONITOR,

MARCH 9, 1912

TEINGARTNER SYMPHONY PLAYED

The Boston Symphony orchestra reearsed its eighteenth program in Symhony hall Friday afternoon, playing for he first time in Boston Felix Weingartner's Symphony No. 3 in E major. The oloist was Miss Maud Powell, who pre-ented the Sibelius violin concerto. The rogram was as follows:

Weingartner, Symphony No. 3, in E
major, op. 49; Sibelius, concerto for vio-
in and orchestra, in D minor, op. 47;
Smetana, overture to the opera "Prodana Nevesta."

The two leading numbers on the program just balance each other in the negative and positive accounts. The symphony deserves the bluntest disapproval; the concerto the loudest praise.
The new piece by Weingartner thus is of more critical importance and must be discussed first. The illustrious musician who as conductor of opera lately gave artistic Boston such a stirring as it has not had before in a half dozen years, has put together in his third symphony a great deal of orchestration and very little original thinking. This is the comment that is made in nearly every review of a new piece of symphonic music nowadays. And it is the one that begins half the discussions started in the 10-minute recess of the Symphony concerts. It is a safe remark to make in almost all cases, because modern symphonic works are necessarily complex in their instrumentation; they would not be acceptable to the audiences of today unless they were. And the joke about want of thought in a first-time composition, trite as it is, always passes off well. It is an ingenious fabric, we say, but it lacks real invention; and every time we repeat this observation we think we have added substantially to the philosophic sum of things. The comment stands very bravely alone, if we have only a moment during the intermission to stop and speak, or it bears developing three or four times the length of one of the end corridors.

The symphony, though marked off into the usual four movements with the diverse moods of the traditional cyclic composition, is not remarkable for its contrasts. A desire to keep unity of feeling in the work seems to have made the composer restrain the fun of his scherzo and circumscribe the seriousness of his adagio. He never really let things go until he came to his finale, when he wrote a very lively and interesting piece of music. For some minutes here, throwing all concern for his symphonic dignity to the winds, he was in his own vein and not that of Bruckner, Strauss or Reger.
Unpretentiously he composed, and signally he triumphed. Mr. Weingartner has not the knack of hitting off a theme that he can claim as his. And inasmuch as he is too conscientious an artist to borrow another's inventions, he goes to the treatises on counterpoint and picks out uninspired melodic fragments which are the property of everybody.

The man who is one of the first four musicians in the world in practical acquaintance with the scores of the orchestral masters, is a remarkable mixer of tone colors. Knowing every combination of instruments ever made, he is entirely sure when he has devised a new one. If tone color were an end in itself, instead of an ornament of orchestral expression;
if it were anything more than a sort of rhythmic adjunct to themes and their development, Felix Weingartner would be one of the great symphonists of the day. He wrote effectively the variations of his finale, because he was in a form where treatment is of first importance and thematic originality a secondary consideration. There was no line in the music here but stood out with the utmost clarity, no combination but had a striking and pleasing effect.

Mr. Weingartner can individualize any voice in the orchestra and give its tone quality new significance. And he can make any two voices sing dramatically together. He is one of the few composers who are judicious in adding organ to orchestra. When he asks for the tinkling celesta it is for a well-considered purpose. His double basses are not the submerged tenth of the social system.
His French horns are not set to singing airs that only the flute can properly execute. His heavy brass choir is satisfied with one good opportuinty to express its opinion. Of course the Wein-gartner feeling for larger rhythm is sensitive. The preparations for the start of a new line of thinking are always judiciously considered. There are some captivating dissonances in the first movement marking thematic transitions.

The new symphony was enthusiastically presented. Both the conductor and the players were bent on giving the piece the best possible interpretation. And truly few works that they have studied lately have given such scope for the finer points of their technique than this one.
It was however only a pleasant tonal excursion; it was not one of the serious adventures of the year.

Miss Powell gave a brilliant and engrossing performance of the Sibelius concerto. Her manner of interpretation is well balanced between a subjective consideration of the composer's thought and an avowal of her own ideas to the audience. Her purpose plainly was to leave Sibelius, rather than herself, with her listeners. But she was never affectedly diffident about asserting the individuality of her tone and the scholarship of her technique. Mr. Fiedler lent her an unusually helpful accompaniment, doubtless glad to have at his left hand a solist of such musical earnestness.

The music department of the city of Boston gives a municipal chamber concert at the Girls' Latin school, Tuesday evening, March 12, at 8 o'clock. The soloists are Miss Mary H. Sheedy, pianist; Mrs. Olive Whiteley Hilton, violinist; Miss Virginia Stickney, violoncellist, and Miss Mary R. Tracy, soprano.

The program includes trio, B flat, op.
11, allegro con brio, Beethoven; Serenade de Milenka, Blockx; Bolero, op. 1, Arbos; Walzer-Scherzo, op. 43, Strauss; trio in
D minor, op. 42, finale, Gade.

The music department gives a concert at Franklin Union Friday evening, March 15, at 8 o'clock. It consists of chamber music for wind instruments by the Longy Club sextet. The program includes music by Thuilln, C. Kriess, Mozart, Gouvy, A. Klughardt and C.
Ofrief.

An orchestral concert will be given at Dorchester high school, Thursday evening, March 14, at 8 o'clock, with the following soloists: Albert C. Orcutt, tenor, and Walter E. Loud, violinist. The program includes: Overture to the opera
"Maritana," Wallace; nocturne, Dionisio
Cericola; fantasie on the opera "Le Donne Curiose," Wolf-Ferrari; solo for the violin, introduction and allegro from concerto in E minor, Mendelssohn.

GLOBE—

MARCH 9, 1912.

WEINGARTNER'S NEW THIRD SYMPHONY

Orchestral Color Excels Power in Invention.

Maud Powell Plays Brilliantly in Sibelius Concerto.

The program of the 18th Symphony rehearsal included Weingartner's symphony in E minor, No. 3 (first time in Boston), Sibelius, concerto in D minor for violin and orchestra, op. 47, Maud Powell soloist; Smetana, overture to the opera "The Sold Bride."

Mr Weingartner's symphony was played for the first time in this country last Dec 28 by the Philharmonic Orchestra in New York, and for the first time anywhere a year, a month and a day previous to that, by the composer himself, at the season's third concert of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, of which he was conductor.
Mr Weingartner's name first appeared upon the programs of the Boston Symphony concerts Oct 29, 30, 1897, when his arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was first performed here.
Mr Gericke played his second symphony in G major in 1901 (April 12-13) and his tone poem, "The Elysian Fields," in 1903 (March 6-7). During Mr Weingartner's recent visit to Boston interest and admiration was deepened for his creative talent by the performance by Lucille Marcel at a Sunday night (Feb 18) concert at the Boston Opera House of three of his songs, with orchestra. They disclosed fertility of invention, a sense of color, of apt interpretation of the text and a regard for proportion.

It is little more than a fortnight since
Mr Weingartner's return to Europe after his brief sojourn here, one which begot pleasant memories of him as conductor, composer, accompanist and genial gentleman. The performance of the symphony yesterday again called to mind the range and diversity of his musical labors. Of his contemporaries, Mahler alone bears comparison, for aside from his exacting occupa tion as a conductor in Vienna, both in the opera house and concert room, he was writing titanic symphonies. Nine were finished and he was engaged upon the 10th at the time of his unfortunate illness and death.

The new symphony is laid out on a large scale, and demands a large and somewhat unusual orchestral apparatus, four flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), hecklephone, the comparatively recently devised baritone of the oboe family; three clarinets, two in A and one D, although B flat and A, rarely C, are the accustomed keys for the orchestral clarinet, until Strauss insists upon transferring the shrill voiced one in E flat from the military band. By demanding an instrument a half step lower the composer evidently has a brilliant timbre in mind. He also requires for his orchestral machinery six horns, a bass trumpet, if possible four instead of two harps, and these in addition to the large roster of instruments now considered established members of the modern orchestra.

In the use of this large orchestral mechanism—in which the organ also is included—the composer has obtained some interesting and engaging effects.
In the spontaneity of his creative power and in a sense of proportion and of coherence in the development of musical thought there is less to provoke admiration.

The thematic material is on the whole favorable and well suited to elaboration, germs of musical ideas and not fortuitous combinations of notes. The exposure of the principal and contrasting themes of the first movement promises well. There is indisputable skill in combination and in instrumental treatment. The section of development is less well sustained. There is a tendency here to monotony through un-relieved and insistent sequence and through level lines of dynamics, traits which are unfortunately prevalent in other portions of the work, and which dull nerves against appreciation rather than inciting them by means of variety to it. The approach to what appears to be a recapitulation of this movement is a case in point. The composer obviously desires an impressive ascent, but it is labored rather than winged and inevitable, both by reason of the sequence of a figure and the color of the harmonization.

The second movement is the best in creative fancy of the four. A vivacious phrase leaps up in the strings, as is true of the last. Its several spirited repetitions find momentarily disappointing answers in the chords of muted horns, but the spirit of the movement quickly emerges and is well sustained thereafter, with vivacity and charm.
The principal theme is of fine animation, spontaneous and communicating, and it passes lightly through strings and woodwind. In the latter choir occurs one of the most apt touches of the work in the quiet episode alternating with muted horns.

The third movement, alternating with the second in the usual order, is an adagio. There are plausible, even fertile themes, but in seeking breadth and majesty the composer has often-est found heaviness. The melody of the clarinet in the middle section is gracious and inviting, yet he has encumbered it with an organ point and an accompanying figure repeated to the length of tedium and of the obscurity of the solo voice, a strange condition when one remembers some of Mr Weingartner's salient traits as a conductor, and Mr Fiedler obviously led with care yesterday.

The last movement contains a bewildering array of contrapuntal and color-istic dexterity. There is a piquant fugue whose first subject is announced by clarinet, answered by oboe, with
'celli, violins and basses then following.
There is a waltz in which it has been said exist memories of "Die Fledermaus." It may be that in his treatment of it the composer was recalling his final combination of all the themes in his arrangement of the "Invitation to the Dance." The sustained character of the theme in the basses somewhat detracts from the brilliance of the waltz rhythm. There is also a recollection in this movement of the theme in the scherzo, one of the best in the symphony. Mr Fiedler had evidently prepared the work with painstaking and the orchestra played with sensitiveness and appreciation.

Mme Powell is to be thanked for playing a concerto of sincerity of speech and of musical value, rather than a medium for technical display. The music of Sibelius is of a noble sombreness, which often attains elegaic exaltation and grandeur, as though the composer would break the bounds of one instru-ment's limitations and set it soaring with the gift of many voices.

The soloist played with masterful authority, breadth and dignity of style in bravura, with abundant command of technic in passages demanding the skill of the virtuoso, and with a wealth of expressive power in cantilena. Unfortunately her keen sense of rhythm was not aided by her accompaniment. There have been occasions this year when a soloist would have been better supported by the piano.

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 9, 1912

WEINGARTNER'S THIRD SYMPHONY IS HEAR

SEEMS FRAGMENTARY IN EARLIER PERIODS

But Brilliancy of the Last Movement Atones for Shortcomings—Miss Powell the Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Weingartner, Symphony No. 3. E major.
Sibelius. Violin Concerto, D minor.
Smetana. "The Sold Bride" Overture.
Soloist, Miss Maud Powell.

No man can serve two masters. No man can be as great a conductor as Weingartner is and at the same time be a great master of composition. We remember very well what Wagner, Richard Strauss and Berlioz have done in the two fields, but they were not as great as conductors as they were in the field of composition.

Of course, one can find great fluency, skill, art of scoring and of combining themes, in this Weingartner symphony, but one cannot find the grand sweep, the convincing power of a Schumann, or a Bruckner, or a Brahms, any of whom might have taken lessons of Weingartner in orchestral ease. As the symphony is supposed to be Viennese, it is not surprising to find waltz rhythms in it both in the second movement and in the finale.
Berlioz and Tschaikowsky have both made attempts to introduce the waltz into symphony, but without distinguished success.
The 6/4 rhythm of this dance (always wrongly written 3/4) is not very susceptible of development, and never reaches the epic vein of the symphony. Nevertheless it was pleasant to hear reminiscences of the "Fledermaus," and how it made us long to hear that jovial opera again!

Two things are imperative in every modern symphony, great length and heavy scoring. Every known, and often some almost unknown, instrument is called for in your 20th century "Partitur." In this work the Heckelphone, bass-clarinette, contra-bassoon, bass trumpet, celesta, the "battery," and the organ, are added to the regular forces, and extra harps, horns etc., are called for.

It means great skill to manage such a tonal army, and this skill Mr. Weingartner possesses in a great degree. Yet the effect at first is artificial; as if every thing had been planned out in cold blood.
The work seemed fragmentary, and the constantly recurring figure of eight notes was as ugly as one could wish for even in these modern times. The second movement served up hashed waltz. The dancers were pulled up short every few measures and the end was very bizarre.
There was an abundance of piccolo spice here.

The third movement is the gem of the work. Here Weingartner becomes almost Titanic in power. It is the slow movement, for the usual order is here reversed and the scherzo comes second. It begins with a deep set of Tschaikowskian growls on the deepest notes of the trombones. There is a tremendous organ-point, under a strangely ruminating passage which is majestic in spite of its monotony. The organ enters here with great effect.
Finally, with an overwhelming crash the movement stops. Do not be deceived!
Like Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"
(which Weingartner has scored very finely) this has a false ending. While half the hall are applauding, the movement starts up again, with a totally unnecessary addition, and the applauders blush and are silent.

The finale at times adds to the saturnalia of sound, but not as heavily as might have been expected. It leans rather to the fugal vein, and gives some excellent contrapuntal treatment. When the demon of variations has a composer in thrall one must generally resign oneself to a prolonged seance. But in this case Weingartner is not very prolix, and soon ends with a waltz, which is rather a non sequitur to the very earnest third movement. Well, the task is over.
We have heard Weingartner's third symphony. We should like to hear the third movement again.

Sibelius has not much more to say in his concerto that Weingartner in his symphony. There is much solo display of the violin, but one prefers that a concerto should lean more to the orchestral side.
The soloist is in the lime-light almost half of the time. Naturally this displayed Miss Powell in a manner that pleased her friends, and it was made evident that she has many such in Boston. Yet the im-provisational style of the work, and its long stretches of unsupported solo, even from the very beginning, are not altogether pleasing to the symphonic auditor. At times there is a species of dialogue between soloist and orchestra, but it is exceptional to find the best concerto ideal in the work—symphonic thoughts with a thread of solo interwoven.

Nevertheless the themes are often striking and have that Norse melancholy which is one great charm in the work of Sibelius
In the finale there was at last a theme, the subordinate subject, given to the orchestra, but generally the violin stayed in the foreground, the most that the orchestra furnished being a ground-bass.

Of course all this displayed Miss Powell's great technique in the clearest manner.
There was surety of intonation, brilliancy, excellent harmonics, some broad G-string work, in short everything that goes to make the pyrotechnics of the violin. We cannot say that we were much moved by this display, excellent though it was, but the audience thought differently and recalled Miss Powell many times.

Smetana's overture to "Die Verkaufte Braut" might serve to remind us of the number of world-famous operas that Boston is yet to hear for the first time. There is Glinka's "Life of the Czar," Cornelius'
"Barber of Bagdad," Wolf's "Corregidor," Smetana's chief opera and several other important works which have not yet been heard here. Smetana, like Sibelius, does not scorn direct melody; but his emotions are less sombre than those of the Finn.

In this overture there is much that is fugal, but it is bright and chattering all the same, like the fugato in the "Magic Flute overture." It was played in a crisp and effective manner, Mr. Fiedler being even more energetic than usual with gesture and baton. The concert as a whole, however, did not seem as interesting or as refreshing as usual.

It might be described as a pretentious composition, pretentious in the true sense of the word, not as it is used, a synonymn of "sumptuous," "gorgeous," in the vocabulary of the modern press agent. It is laid out at great length and consumes an hour of valuable time in the playing. It is scored for all sorts of instruments, though we miss the concertina which appeals to the ingenious Mr. Joseph Holbrooke, nor is the ocarina family represented.
Nothing, however, is gained by the use of the extra instruments. The organ swells the volume of sound in the third movement, and, as is always the case when an audience hears an organ with an orchestra, applause yesterday followed the climax, although the movement was not at an end. With all this apparatus, Mr. Weingartner does not succeed in procuring new effects, nor are his combinations unusual in color.
The instrumentation is conventional. At times, as in the variations of the finale, it seems experimental and is ineffective.
There are times when it is paltry, feeble, as when the waltz movement is played by the flute with accompaniment of celesta and harp. There was a Frenchman by the name of Auber who with the ordinary orchestra of his time scored more brilliantly and with a finer sense of proportion and color in the overtures to his operas. There is a Frenchman named Saint-Saens whose scores look thin to the eye and ravish the ear. It is not the number and variety of instruments employed that give a work distinction; it is the manner in which the ordinary orchestra is used. And it may here be said that in the majority of pages of this symphony the extra instruments could be dropped out without making any material difference.

There is a decided lack of melodic invention in this symphony. The influence of many composers is recognized. There are few musical thoughts worthy of attention. In the first movement the opening theme promises something, but the development of this motive and of the broad chromatic theme, and of fragments of the two, is laborious and wearisome. There is little variety in the successive treatments. There is endless repetition. The second movement, which may be called a scherzo, is cheaply constructed. Its chief theme is common, not piquant. The trio section is no better. The third movement, an Adagio, is the best of the four. There are moments of genuine beauty, of true nobility of thought, but they are few. I have already spoken of the variations in the Finale. They are now halting, now pedantic. There are thundering hints at the waltz to come; for the conclusion is in waltz form, a form dear to the Viennese, and at that time Mr. Weingartner was director of the Vienna Court Opera and also of the Philharmonic concerts.
The waltz finally comes. It recalls the apology of the old Grecian for having such an elaborate funeral when the dead child was so small. A waltz by any one of the leading Viennese operetta composers would be much more to the purpose.

It was the intention of Miss Powell to play Beethoven's violin concerto at this concert. Enthusiasts over the music of Sibelius wrote to her, urging her to play
the concerto of the Finnish composer, which she introduced in Boston about five years ago, when she played with the Symphony orchestra. She heeded the request, although she, liking the concerto, must have known that she would have won more applause if her task had been more grateful.

It is true that the first two movements are unusual. They are in the nature of concert pieces for orchestra with violin. The first is rhapsodic, grimly emotional, elemental in its stubborn fierceness. It is granitic music, and what beauty there is in it is the beauty that may be associated with a desolate moor and a threatening sky, while the rebellious sun sinks slowly behind a bank of clouds. The second movement is of lofty, sustained and sombre eloquence. The Finale, with the coda by Pietro Floridia, is of less value, but its aggressive and defiant rhythm is more to the taste of the people than are the features of the preceding movements.

Miss Powell, as before, overcame the technical difficulties with consummate ease, and played with the conviction and the authority that have ranked her high in the list of violinists.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz"; Strauss, Symphonia Domestica; Beethoven, Concerto in E flat major, No. 5, for piano and orchestra. Wilhelm Bachaus will be the pianist.

HERALD,

MARCH 9, 1912.

SYMPHONY HAS 18TH REHEARSAL

Weingartner's New Composition the First Piece on the Program.

LONG AND UNINTERESTING

Miss Maud Powell Plays Sibelius's Rhapsodic Finnish Concerto.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 18th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Maud Powell was the solo violinist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in E major.....Weingartner
Concerto in D minor for violin.....Sibelius
Overture to "The Sold Bride".....Smetana

Mr. Weingartner is a distinguished conductor; a man of ingratiating manners and agreeable conversation. He has composed some songs that are interesting and effective. He has written sensibly about the Symphony since Beethoven and shrewdly about the art of conducting. We have yet to hear any orchestral work or chamber music by him that shows conspicuous melodic invention or marked skill in thematic development and instrumental coloring.

A Symphony and a Symphonic poem have been played at these concerts.
They were the respectable fruit of honest labor. This new Symphony was produced in Vienna a year ago last November. It was played in New York by the Philharmonic Society at the end of December, 1911.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 19, 1912

Dr. Muck's Plans

As Dr. Muck has made his plans for the spring and the summer prior to his coming again to the Symphony Orchestra, he will conduct at the Royal Opera in Berlin until the end of the season, about June 15, where he is charged in particular with the restudying and the remounting of Wagner's music-dramas of "The Ring," which are now going forward there. Later, in June he will conduct at the concerts of the Rhenish Festival at Aix-la-Chapelle—concerts especially devoted to the performance of new music by German composers.
Thereafter he will go to Baireuth to conduct in "Parsifal" at the summer festival.
Next will come a few weeks of holiday and then Dr. Muck will return to Berlin for two "farewell performances" at the Royal Opera, now appointed for Sept. 18 and 19.
Immediately after these, he will set out for Boston to pick up his work here at the beginning of October.

[167]

AMERICAN— MARCH 17, 1912.

SLEZAK AND GLUCK TO ASSIST CECELIA

Last Concert of the Society in Program of Solos and Part Songs.

The reorganized Cecilia Society brings its season to an end next Thursday night, when, with the assistance of Madame Alma Gluck and Leo Slezak of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, it gives its second and last concert in Symphony Hall. It was originally announced that the assisting artists would be Madame Emma Eames and Mr. Emilio de Gorgorza, but their engagement was cancelled on account of Madame Eames' unexpected return to Europe. It is believed, however, that Madame Gluck and Mr. Slezak are amply fitted to take their places.

Madame Gluck, who has sung here once in oratorio and in opera, and who sang here at the opening concert of the Symphony season this year, is one of the foremost lyric sopranos now before the public. Her attractive personality, lovely voice and sound musicianship have, in three years, raised her to the foremost rank of singers of her kind.

Mr. Slezak, at a song recital in Jordan Hall a few weeks ago, showed a command of the more intimate side of his art, which was most unexpected and most convincing and aroused extraordinary enthusiasm in his audience.

The program will be made up entirely of solo numbers and part songs in "a cappella" scores, for no orchestra will be employed. Mr. Arthur Mees, the conductor of the Cecilia, who is ending his first season, has fully justified the judgment of those who invited him to take the post and under his leadership the Cecilia Society has once more regained its old premier position in Boston choral societies.

SLEZAK
CILIA SOLOIST
MISHKIN STUDIO

© MISHKIN STUDIO N.Y.

ALMA GLUCK SOPRANO.

HERALD, MARCH 17, 1912.

The reorganized Cecilia Society will bring its season to an end next Thursday night when, with the assistance of Mme. Alma Gluck and Mr. Slezak of the Metropolitan opera company of New York, it will give its second and last concert in Symphony Hall. It was announced that the assisting artists would be Mme. Eames and Mr. Gogorza, but their engagement was cancelled on account of Mme. Eames's illness and unexpected return to Europe. Mme. Gluck, who has sung here in oratorio and in opera, and at the opening concert of the Symphony season this year, is one of the foremost lyric sopranos now before the public. Her attractive personality and voice have given her a prominent position. Mr. Slezak is regarded as one of the leading heroic tenors of our time, and at a song recital in Jordan Hall a few weeks since he showed a fine taste in lyrical interpretation.

The program will be made up entirely of solo numbers and part songs "a cappella." Mr. Mees will conduct.

The program is as follows:

Motet "Praise the Lord all ye Heathen" (Psalm CXVII).....Bach
The Cecilia.

Songs—Salomo.....Hermann
Verschwiegene Liebe.....Wolf
Die Lorelei.....Liszt
Ashes of Roses.....Woodman
Ecstasy.....Rummel
Mr. Slezak.

Miss Alma Gluck.

Leo Slezak.
[Copyright by Mishkin Studio.]

Hymn to the Virgin Mary.....Verdi
Female voices of the Cecilia Society.

Songs—Rossignols amoureux.....Rameau
La Colomba.....Schindler
Warnung.....Mozart
Mme. Gluck.

"Liebe dir ergeb ich mich" (in eight parts).....Cornelius
"For one who fell in battle" (in eight parts).....Loeffler
The Cecilia.

Assad's narrative from "the Queen of Sheba".....Goldmark
Mr. Slezak.

Tomorrow (trio for female voices).....Foote
Spring delight.....Cui
The Cecilia.

Songs—Song of the Shepherd Lehl.
Chant Hindu.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Psyche.....Paladilhe
My Laddie.....Thayer
Mme. Gluck.

Hunting Song.....Benedict
Ntherland Folksong.....Arranged by Kremser
The Cecilia.

HERALD, MARCH 19, 1912.

MISS ALMA GLUCK

Soprano Who Will Be Heard with the Cecilia Society Thursday Evening.

ALMA GLUCK TO BE HEARD WITH CECILIA

Lyric Soprano Will Then Spend Two Years Abroad.

Alma Gluck, the lyric soprano of the Metropolitan opera company, who will be one of the soloists at the Cecilia concert in Symphony Hall Thursday evening, March 21, is to spend the next two years abroad, and will not be heard again in this country until the season of 1914-15. Miss Gluck, although a Roumanian by birth, has lived in this country since early childhood, and her entire public career has been in America, this being her fourth season on the stage. She feels that now it is time for her to go and test her powers before foreign audiences. She is to appear through Europe the next two years in concert and as "guest" at several of

Herald March 17, 1912

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight on the last southern trip of the season. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and a week from tomorrow a concert will be given in New Haven. Mme. Louise Homer will be the soloist at all of the concerts except that at New York Saturday afternoon, and at New Haven Mme. Alma Gluck will be the soloist. Mr. Fiedler will make his farewell appearances in these cities.

POST, MARCH 17, 1912

LAST CECILIA CONCERT

The reorganized Cecilia Society brings its season to an end next Thursday night when, with the assistance of Madame Alma Gluck and Mr. Leo Slezak of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, it gives its second and last concert in Symphony Hall. It was originally announced that the assisting artists would be Madame Emma Eames and Mr. Emilio de Gogorza, but their engagement was cancelled on account of Madame Eames' illness and unexpected return to Europe. Fully as much, however, is expected of the appearance of Madame Gluck and Mr. Slezak.

Madame Gluck, who has sung here once in oratorio and in opera, and who sang here at the opening concert of the Symphony season this year, is one of the most popular lyric sopranos now before the public.

Mr. Slezak of the Metropolitan opera is regarded as one of the most accomplished dramatic tenors of the day.

The programme will be made up entirely of solo numbers, and part songs—"a capella." No orchestra will be employed. The full programme is as follows:

Motet, "Praise the Lord, all ye heathen" (Psalm CXVII.).....Bach
The Cecilia Society.

Songs.
Salome.....Hermann
Verschwiegene Liebe.....Hugo Wolf
Die Lorelei.....Liszt
Ashes of Roses.....Huntington Woodman
Ecstasy.....Walter Morse Hummel
Mr. Slezak.

Hymn to the Virgin Mary.....Verdi
Women's voices of the Cecilia Society.

Songs.
Rossignols Amoureux.....Rameau
La Colomba.....Schlinder
Warnung.....Mozart
Madame Gluck.

"Liebe dir ergeb ich mich" (chorus in eight parts).....Cornelius
The Cecilia Society.

PART II.

"For one who fell in battle" (chorus in eight parts).....Loeffler
The Cecilia Society.

Assad's Narrative from "The Queen of Sheba".....Goldmark
Mr. Slezak.

Tomorrow (trio for women's voices).....Foote
Spring Delight.....Cui
The Cecilia Society.

Songs.
Song of the Shepherd Lehl.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Chant Hindu.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Psyche.....Paladilhe
My Laddie.....Thayer
Madame Gluck.

Hunting Song.....Benedict
Netherland Folksong.....Arranged by Kremser
The Cecilia Society.

Katharine Goodson

At her recital in Jordan Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock, Katharine Goodson, the pianist, will play the following programme:

Kinderscenen, Op. 15.....Schumann
Novelette in E major.....Schumann
Romance in F sharp.....Schumann
Rhapsodie in E flat, Op. 119.....Brahms
Sonata Tragica.....MacDowell
Romance in A flat, Op. 29, No. 3.....Hinton
Etude Arabesque, Op. 29, No. 2.....Hinton
Barcarolle.....Rubenstein
Arabesque.....Debussy
Berceuse.....Chopin
Etude in F.....Chopin
Valse in A flat, Op. 34.....Chopin
Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53.....Chopin

ALMA GLUCK AND LEO SLEZAK,
Appearing with the Cecilia Society next Thursday evening.
[Photos copyrighted by Mishkin Studio.]

[168]

RECORD. MARCH 19, 1912 POST,

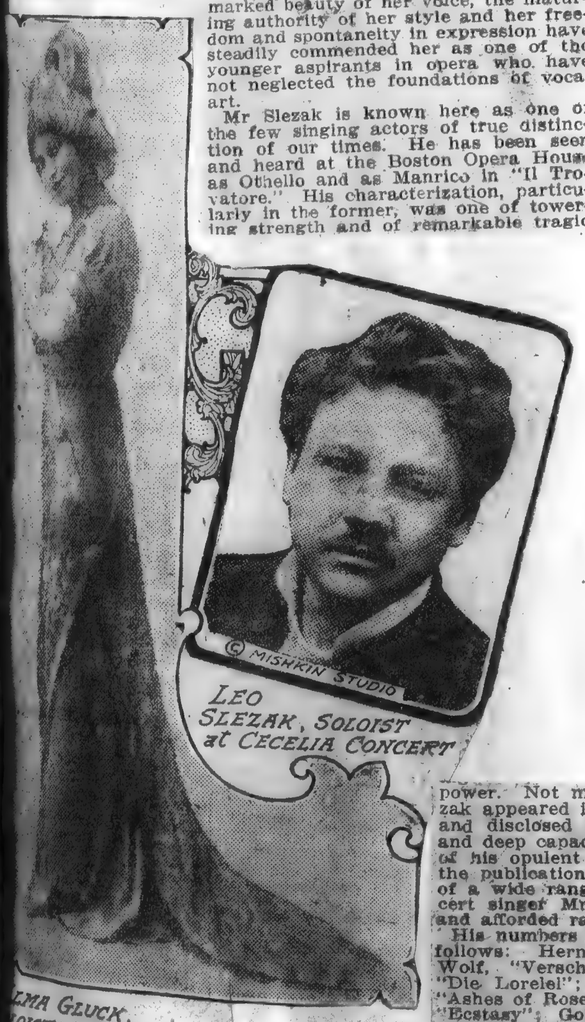
...LMA GLUCK TO APPEAR WITH SLEZAK AT THE CECILIA CONCERT.

MISS ALMA GLUCK.

The last opportunity that Boston will have to hear Miss Alma Gluck for at least two years will be at the Cecilia Society concert in Symphony hall on Thursday, when she will be one of the soloists. Miss Gluck, curiously enough, has never sung in Europe, her entire career having been spent in this country. This spring she goes abroad to be gone for two years, and will sing in concert throughout England and the Continent, and will appear in a number of the larger opera houses as well.

GLOBE—MARCH 17, 1912.

Alma Gluck and Leo Slezak Will Be the Soloists at the Cecilia Concert



...LMA GLUCK,
...OIST at CECELIA
CONCERT.

The Cecilia Society will give its second and last concert of the season Thursday night at Symphony Hall. The soloists will be Mme Alma Gluck and Leo Slezak of the Metropolitan Opera
House, in place of Mme Eames and Mr Gogorza as previously announced, a change necessitated by the illness of Mme Eames.

The two soloists now to appear are highly esteemed in Boston. In the three years and a half since Mme Gluck made her debut as Sophia in a performance of "Werther" by the Metropolitan company at the New (now Century)
Theatre, New York, she has made rapid and sure progress. She has already sung in Boston as Mimi in a performance of "La Boheme" by the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Boston
Opera House (March 30, 1910), in Verdi's
Requiem with the Handel and Haydn
Society, and as soloist at the first pair of Symphony concerts this season. The marked beauty of her voice, the maturing authority of her style and her freedom and spontaneity in expression have steadily commended her as one of the younger aspirants in opera who have not neglected the foundations of vocal art.

Mr Slezak is known here as one of the few singing actors of true distinction of our times. He has been seen and heard at the Boston Opera House as Othello and as Manrico in "Il Trovatore." His characterization, particularly in the former, was one of towering strength and of remarkable tragic power. Not many weeks ago Mr Slezak appeared in Boston as a recitalist, and disclosed intelligence, discernment and deep capacity of feeling in the use of his opulent vocal resources, and in the publication of the import of songs of a wide range of moods. As a concert singer Mr Slezak was a surprise and afforded rare pleasure.

His numbers on Thursday will be as follows: Hermann, "Salomo," Hugo Wolf, "Verschwiegene Liebe"; Liszt, "Die Lorelei"; Huntington Woodman, "Ashes of Roses"; Walter M. Rummel, "Ecstasy"; Goldmark, Assad's narrative from "The Queen of Sheba."

Mme Gluck will sing: Rameau, Rossignols amoureux; Kurt Schindler, La Colomba; Mozart Warnung; Rimsky-Korsakoff, song of the shepherd Lehl, chant Hindu; Paladilhe, Psyche; Thayer, My Laddie.

The Cecilia's program will be composed of unaccompanied part songs, as follows: Bach, motet, "Praise the Lord, All Ye Heathen" (Psalm CXVII); Verdi, "Hymn to the Virgin Mary" (women's voices); Cornelius, "Liebe die ergeb ich mich" (chorus in eight parts); Charles Martin Loeffler, "For One Who Fell in Battle" (eight parts); Foote, "Tomorrow" (trio for women's voices); Cui, Spring delight; Benedict, Hunting Song; Netherland Folk Song (arranged by Kremser).

Mr Loeffler's eight-part chorus was sung for the first time March 16, 1911, in New York by the Musical Art Society, Frank Damrosch conductor. The poem beginning, "Room for a Soldier," was written by T. W. Parsons, and the work is dedicated to Maj Henry L. Higginson, "in memory of his comrades who never returned from the war."

Arthur Mees, who has revived interest among the membership of this excellently voiced chorus, will conduct.

MARCH 22, 1912

NOVELTIES BY THE CECILIAS

Important Works Sung at Final Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The final concert by the Cecilia Society this season took place last night in Symphony Hall. Alma Gluck and Leo Slezak of the Metropolitan Opera Company were the assisting artists. The choral compositions were Bach's setting of Psalm CXVII., "Praise the Lord, All Ye Heathen"; Verdi's "Hymn to the Virgin Mary," for women's voices; Cornelius' eight-part chorus, "Liebe Dir Ergeb' Ich Mich," sung for the first time in Boston; Charles M. Loeffler's eight-part chorus, a capella, "For One Who Fell in Battle," after the poem of T. W. Parsons; "Tomorrow," trio for women's voices, sung for the first time, Arthur Foote; "Spring Delight," Cui; "Hunting Song," Benedict; "Netherland Folk Song," arranged by Kremer.

Mme. Gluck sang these songs: "Rossignols Amoureux," Rameau; "La Colomba," Schindler; "Warnung," Mozart; "Song of the Shepherd Lehl, and Chant Hindu," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "My Laddie," Thayer. Mr. Slezak sang the narrative of Assad from Goldmark's opera, "The Queen of Sheba," and these songs: "Salome," Hermann; "Verschwiegene Liebe," Hugo Wolf; "Die Loreley," Hugo Wolf; "Ashes of Roses," Huntington Woodman; "Ecstasy," Walter Morse Rummel, and both artists added generously to the songs announced on the printed programme.

The singing of the chorus was marked by more finish, greater precision and variety of coloring than has been the rule of late, and the programme had interest and variety. One of the most important offerings of the evening was the performance of Mr. Loeffler's noble composition, a composition which reflects and exalts the mood of the fine poem which gave it birth.

There is impressive lament for one who has gone before. There is also the note of grave exaltation and awe, which is not despair, for the "superb vistas of death" that await the humblest of us on the other side. The harmonic style is not the easiest perhaps for the singers, yet it is splendidly simple and unaffected. There is no strained attempt to make a surpassing effect. The mood is felt by the composer so genuinely and so deeply that it is unnecessary for him to do more than say quietly and impressively what he perceives so clearly.

The work and the performance which Dr. Mees had prepared so earnestly and carefully were received with great enthusiasm. Mr. Loeffler finally rose and bowed from his seat on the floor, and later in the evening Mr. Foote was similarly called forth after his graceful and melodious composition for women's voices. The accompaniment of the Bach anthem had been rearranged by Professor John P. Marshall, the organist. It is music in the composer's best vein, and it was a fortunate opening of the programme. The chorus of Cornelius is fine music and the voice leading effective.

With this as a background the concert was more of a soloists' affair than a choral performance, for after Mr. Slezak and Miss Gluck had sung their allotted sing, there were endless recalls. The enthusiasm was justified, for both of these singers have voices and individualities which place them in the very forefront of contemporaneous singers.

Miss Gluck's voice is a rare one, lyric, sensuous, utterly beautiful. She has studied well, and she is naturally musical, even musicianly. Mr. Slezak's voice and manner are now well known in Boston. The voice is exceptionally heroic and expressive. Mr. Slezak is an interpreter of exceptional eloquence. There was plentiful reward for himself and his winsome colleague. The audience was of good size.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 13, 1912

The Pause, the Audience and the Music

IN one respect, the German and the American audience go to opposite extremes in the conduct of their symphony concerts. Usually, in Germany or in Austria, at a serious concert, there is a halt rather than a pause between the movements of a symphony, a suite or a concerto, and the audience is expected to reserve its applause for the end of the piece as a whole. The purpose on the stage and in the auditorium is unbroken, undisturbed, and cumulative effect. Neither the performers or the listeners are to have time to slip out of the mood and the atmosphere of the symphony, for example, or distraction from it. Here in America, on the contrary, the conductors make relatively long pauses between the movements of a piece so divided, and the audience have so long taken leave to applaud in them that such clappings is a part of the routine of symphony concerts. If a symphony, for example, stands first on the programme, these pauses are sure to be lengthened by the late-comers who must find the seats. If it ends the concert, those who are departing betimes must have their opportunity to reach the doors. Sometimes, the pause is so long and the incidents that fill it so distracting that conductor and players become restless, and the audience has to project itself, so to say, into the music. Dr. Muck used to be impatient of these protracted pauses, especially when late-comers or early-goers prolonged them. Mr. Fiedler was plainly resentful of the long "wait" the belated exacted last Saturday between the first and the second movements of Mr. Weingartner's symphony. An audience in America could hardly be persuaded to withhold its applause until the end of a symphony. It has too nervous a temperament for such self-discipline. There is something to be said, too, for our long pauses as means and opportunity to the new point of view that each movement of a symphony demands. On the other hand, it does not seem exactly inevitable or desirable that half-a-hundred late-comers should almost make a pause an interval while they are seeking their seats.

The Cecilia and Its Soloists

Mr. Slezak, Mme. Gluck, and Mr. Mees for the Cecilia have finally ordered the programme of the concert in which the two singers and the reinvigorated choral society are to appear in Symphony Hall on March 21. None of the choral pieces require an orchestral accompaniment and they range far more widely than was once the custom of the Cecilia in the making of its programmes. Three or four are frankly light pieces, designed to amuse the audience as well as to show the more graceful abilities of the choir. The classics have their place in a motet of Bach; the semi-classics in an eight-part chorus by Cornelius, and a hymn by Verdi, and the work of living composers in Mr. Loeffler's setting of the ode "For One Who Fell in Battle." In all these pieces, the women's voices have conspicuous share and they are the chief strength and pleasure of the Cecilia in singing. Mr. Slezak, in turn, will sing an air from Goldmark's opera, "The Queen of Sheba," and five songs, and Mme. Gluck will sing a fragment of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Snégourotchka" and six songs besides. The detailed programme is:

Motet from Psalm cxvii.....Bach
Chorus and Organ.
Salomo.....Hermann
Verschwiegene Liebe.....Wolf
Die Loreley.....Liszt
Ashes of Roses.....Woodman
Ecstasy.....Rummel
Mr. Slezak.
Hymn to the Virgin Mary.....Verdi
Women's Voices.
a Rossignols amoureux.....Rameau
b La Colomba.....Schindler
c Warnung.....Mozart
Mme. Gluck.
Liebe dir Ergeb Ich mich.....Cornelius
Chorus in eight parts.
For One who Fell in Battle.....Loeffler
Chorus in eight parts.
Air from "The Queen of Sheba".....Goldmark
Mr. Slezak.
To-Morrow.....Foote
Women's Voices.
Spring Delight.....Cui
Chorus.
Song of Lel from "Snégourotchka".....
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Chant Hindoo.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Psyche.....Paladilhe
My Laddie.....Thayer
Mme. Gluck.
Hunting Song.....Benedict
Netherland Folksong.....Kremser
Chorus.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 16, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCE...

FIEDLER AND THE ORCHESTRA ON THEIR METTLE

Stirred Audience, Too—The Overture to "Der Freischuetz" in Glowing Performance—Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" Brought to Its Full Beauty and Power—Mr. Bachaus for a Pianist, Calm, Cool and Collected

NEXT week Mr. Fiedler will conduct with the Symphony Orchestra for the last times in the cities to which for four years he has paid monthly visits. By way of prelude to this leave-taking his audience at home seemed yesterday especially cordial to him. It greeted him warmly when he came to his place. It liked the overture to "Der Freischütz," with which the concert began, and applauded music, conductor and orchestra heartily and insistently. A whole century, nearly, has passed since Weber wrote his opera—a century of endless changes in music and the appreciation of the music. "Der Freischütz" in its entirety, as the sounding phrase goes, is rather a dull piece nowadays. The youngsters call a liking for it "distinctly bourgeois"; they are still good enough to let us who are middle-aged and older stir to the romantic imagination and ardor of the overture, to the richness of melody that gives it voice, to the harmonic and the instrumental glow that Weber pours over it. He could strike fire; he could invent melodies that are an emotion in themselves by their beauty and that bear other emotions home. He could fling them together and toss them up again like a magnificent romantic improvisation. The Weberian glow, the Weberian flourish glints and glamors them. Rhetoric, say the youngsters; but rhetoric has been known to stir the human heart and imagination even in a prosaic time. Yesterday, too, it had for aid Mr. Fiedler in his impassioned and orotund vein, with romantic music and the beauty of tone that flowed from horns and woodwinds, while the shadowed or the shimmering strings accented it. The overture yesterday was no exercise in orchestral routine, busy with an "opening piece" that should give late-comers time to hear the ensuing "Domestica." They say that the overture was encored at the first performance of the opera. It deserved to be yesterday.

Orchestra, conductor and audience, too, were on their mettle through the performance of Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." (Oh ingenious Fiedler so to place it on the programme that late-comers could not escape and those that were fain to hear the new pianist must hear the tone-poem first.) Like all of Strauss's pieces, it teems with opportunities for an orchestra of virtuosi to prove its quality, collectively in the several choirs, individually as the music for the instant was almost a single voice. In no way does Strauss prove his superlative orchestral imagination more finely than in the adroitness with which he gives this virtuosity play, yet never obtrudes. The opportunity comes in the normal course, the coördinated design of the music. Yet it almost always tells with the listeners and pricks the choir or the individual player to the utmost of valor. The strings were as one man yesterday in the "Domestica" but one man with manifold and significant voices. The trumpets whether they shouted in the fugue or flung a glowing bridge over a transition were thrilling to hear. The bassoons led the way into the fugue as though they at last had the right to call the whole orchestra to their particular tone. The voice of the child was like a wistful and soft little voice, like the reaching of the little hand toward its mother, as it fell upon the ear from the oboe. And so through all the tone-poem.

Not an instrumental detail seemed to lack due utterance, yet not once, unless it was so designed, did it twist the tonal web or break the flow of the music. Where euphony was the word, as in the music of happy affection and ardent aspiration or in the sleep-chasings the tone of the orchestra was beautiful in its soft, rich, deep texture. It rolled up toward the climax of these songful episodes in all the magnificence of rich and pulsing sonorities. And in the fugue, it leapt with its zests for all these tonal gymnastics, it almost rasped (as it should) in its springy vigor or it seemed to outrun its own and Strauss's ardors. With the "Domestica" two years ago, Mr. Fiedler did not equal himself in Strauss's music. Perhaps after his eloquence with "Ein Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote," we listeners expected too much. Yesterday, with the "Domestica" again, and after a week of unusually assiduous preparation, he excelled anticipation, excelled himself. As with "Don Quixote," he missed hardly a detail, yet kept every one in its place in the voice and the design of the whole tone-poem. The "Domestica" seemed to rise out of itself, to make its own form out of its own compelling moods. At every turn, the music had its due quality of gentle playfulness, of high emotion touched to high beauty, of tender wistfulness, of manly strength, of large, wild elation sporting with its own exhilaration. The whole performance had a magnificent unity, intensity and eloquence. The pace was just and revealing; the rhythms were musical like themselves; the quality was the aptest voice the moment could ask. Seldom has Mr. Fiedler seemed at once so large, so sensitive, and so justly eloquent a conductor.

The "Domestica" is no curiosity now that it has kept its place in the concert-room for eight years. Nobody, who has their musical senses, niggles and sniggers over it in the old "humorous" fashion. Nobody listens to it now merely to sneer and jeer. Nobody, except the learned programmists who must, is much occupied with the delineative details that may be or that have been read into it. Most of us prefer to listen to the music for the beauty that fills it, for the power that propels it, that no passing and usually harmless freak of an overstrained and a little irritated imagination can spoil. Few now, unless they are case-hardened with prejudice or triply shelled in obtuseness and insensibility, can listen to the music of affection and aspiration without thrilling to over to next page.

[169]

the beauty and the intensity of its gathering and upsoaring orchestral song. Polyphony of a most intricate sort has wove in this music, yet it seems as the outpouring of impassioned melody to deeper and deeper beauty. Imagination in tones has fashioned the flickering, evasive, shadowed music of the sleep-chasings. A tenderer spirit than Strauss often releases, warms and colors the music of the childhood—as though his son—and all men's fatherhood—had touched him. He sports lightly in parts of the music, and Strauss at innocent play is as rare as Strauss, the wistful father. And then with what zest of life and creation, with what passionate flinging about in superhuman juggery of tones, he races, rushes, whirls through the fugue. It is the father turned musical super-man.

Yet why, some will say, this huge tone-poem, rising in endless polyphony and endless instrumental device, to express the beauty and the power of such tender and intimate emotions and to be reared upon such slender themes. When a man is deeply moved, he expresses himself in his most natural idiom. To Strauss, composer as well as man, such a tone-poem, so wrought, is his natural idiom. He has written in it almost epically, so big were his emotions. He has transmuted the prose of domesticity into its poetry, written it in tones, and yet kept just a tang of the humors which as all who have liked it know, is a part of its tender emotion. The tone-poet, like other poets, distills out of common things and common experience their beauty, their spirit, their thrill. His transforming wand is the wand of imagination. His voice is an exalting voice. Has not Strauss done these things in this music of the "Domestica"?

AMERICAN—

MARCH 9, 1912.

WEINGARTNER'S SYMPHONY GIVEN

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

A new Symphony by Felix Weingartner was performed by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday and Maud Powell, the violinist, played the Sibelius Concerto.

Weingartner's third Symphony in E major is long winded, for it takes seventy minutes to perform. It does not disclose the famous conductor as a great composer, although it shows him as a man who can speak grandiloquently upon an orchestra.

There are traces of other composers, more particularly Wagner and Brahms, in this work, but it is to be expected that a man who devotes his life to interpreting other composers should have their methods running through his head when he composes himself.

In the slow movement there are places where the instrumentation and even the themes remind one of the second act of "Tristan und Isolde," and there are other resemblances.

Nevertheless, the Symphony produces a pleasant effect, for it proceeds smoothly and gracefully. There is none of the shrieky, shrill and strident music that the modern composers rejoice in, and for so much we can be thankful. There are striking melodies, though not many of them. The last movement is a set of variations on a theme ending with a waltz which is typically Viennese and good to hear. If Weingartner could condense the Symphony to fifty minutes of playing time it would make a better impression.

Maud Powell played the Sibelius violin concerto, in which she was heard here once before. It is not music that appeals particularly, although the first movement is sufficiently interesting. Miss Powell played with the brilliancy expected from her.

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 16, 1912

"DOMESTIC SYMPHONY" SUPERBLY INTERPRETED

AUDIENCE IN FRENZY OF ENTHUSIASM

Yesterday's Performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Was a Memorable One in Every Respect.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Weber—"Der Freischuetz" Overture.
Strauss—Symphonia Domestica.
Beethoven—Piano Concerto, No. 5, in E-flat.
Soloist, Mr. Wilhelm Bachaus.

Somehow the concert seemed immensely more effective than the one of the week before. It was but natural that it should be so, for Beethoven and Weber shine like sun and moon over the modern frenetics, and the great orchestral juggler of the present has always something to say that is interesting, even in his Domestic Infelicity, which, by the way, is by no means Chamber-music.

The strong climaxes of the "Freischuetz" overture, the contra-bass pizzicati, the trombone mockeries and the violin runs, were given with graphic power. The horn quartette, too, began the work with romantic beauty. Yet there are other American orchestras which can equal ours in the matter of brass tones; it is in the strings and in certain parts of the wood-wind that [illegible] wins its undoubted supremacy.

How much there is in this overture of Weber's that a 20th century tone-poetaster would take an orchestral cyclone to express! There is tender tranquility, there is mystery and foreboding, there is irony, and there is jubilant triumph. And it is all done with the "classical orchestra." And it is all done in symmetrical form, too! Not that we crave form in every work, but we deny the modern assertion that form must be broken before emotional power can be attained. It was gratifying to note that the public have not tired of the old school of music. They take occasion to express this at every opportunity, and Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, Mendelssohn, Haydn, etc., are applauded with a vigor that may be one means of conveying a remonstrance, or a protest, against something else. The work was splendidly played, and without any rehearsal, we understand.

We shall always consider the domestic revelations of Strauss as a blemish on Art so far as regards their subject matter. For a man to vaunt himself, his wife, and his infant, in this Brobdignagian fashion, is not in good taste (even if done in a semi-humorous vein), and it might lead the reviewer, since the subject is frankly opened to him, to ask if the tradesmen, the butcher, the baker, and the housemaid, would agree with the musical picture of Mrs. Strauss. If half of the European gossip is true we trow not; and while we are trowing, we might also trow that the infant is not as remarkable as he is painted.

But one must put aside the puerile story, which gives the latchkey to Strauss's home to every auditor, and try to listen to the work purely as a wonderful exhibition of orchestral virtuosity, and a display of figure development that is skilful in the highest degree. This is presented at its best by our orchestra, and Mr. Fiedler is at his very best in interpreting Strauss. Not a figure is lost. Every strand of the tonal web is clearly woven, and the whole result is something to grow very enthusiastic over.

Our orchestra has graduated many celebrities. Gericke and Muck were famous both before and after their Boston sojourn, but Mr. Paur now becomes Imperial Opera conductor in Berlin, Nikisch became world-renowned after his return to Europe from Boston, and we believe that Germany will prize Mr. Fiedler higher than before after his great achievements in our city. Among all his readings his Strauss work has been the highest and the most phenomenal. We believe that no one can excel him in this field.

And this performance of the "Symphonia Domestica" was certainly high-water mark. It was one of those phenomenal performances that the auditor may remember for a lifetime. The different scenes were brought out most graphically. The oboe d'amore pictured the baby with good expression. The trombones brought out the four-noted figure at the end in a manner that caused the auditor to sit up and watch with interest whether the players or the instruments would explode. In augmentation, in diminution, in expansion and contraction, in contrary motion, in short in every known fashion, this figure was thundered and whispered at the auditor in the close of the work. Even the kettle-drums had a bit of tune to play, and those who know the excellent artist who wields the sticks can imagine how striking it was.

We will not search for a soothing-syrup motive, or a safety-pin motive, in the work, but we may express surprise that there is no servant-girl motive. Alas, in the "Domestic Symphony" the domestic is left out. It is all "Monsieur, Madame, et Bebe."

But it is a work that must ever remain interesting. There is a Titanic surety in it that ought to inspire respect even in the critic who sees its faults. And the performance brought out the merits as we have never heard them before. The double fugue was simply wonderful. Every climax was perfectly worked up to, every complicated passage made clear. It was no wonder therefore, that the audience burst forth in a frenzy of enthusiasm at the end. That the conductor is leaving us in a blaze of glory was made evident in this concert. Greater success no man could win, and we are glad to pay a most emphatic tribute to a performance that was most memorable. Of course the orchestra was obliged to rise in acknowledgment also, but the tribute must have been chiefly intended for Mr. Fiedler.

Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto has not been superseded by any of the more recent works in this form. The latterday concertos may be larger, but they are not greater. If any piano concerto goes beyond this one it is Beethoven's own concerto in G, the fourth. We found the work to suit Mr. Wilhelm Bachaus very well. He is a pianist of great technique, but not too temperamental. Therefore he does not "individualize" Beethoven as some pianists do. Yet he is not rigid or stiff in his interpretation. He does not scorn a "rubato" even in Beethoven.

We found the beginning of the final rondo a trifle too aggressive, but having stated this we can praise entirely. It was scarcely fair to Mr. Bachaus, nor to Beethoven either, to place them after Strauss' dazzling glow of modern orchestration. But perhaps it taught the lesson that even modern meteors do not dim the light of a fixed star.

What we admire in Mr. Bachaus's work was his attention to ensemble and his reserve force. One never got the impression that he was at the end of his muscular power. The concerto is absolutely a three-movement symphony, and the orchestral support was all that it should have been. Although it was the end of the concert and people were gathering up their umbrellas and pinning on their hats, yet Mr. Bachaus was recalled several times.

There has seldom been a symphony concert where the applause was so continuous from beginning to end. Each number won its triumph, but the Domestic Symphony must remain its most wonderful and brilliant part.

MARCH 16, 1912

The Cecilia in Choral Pieces with Mr. Slezak and Mme. Gluck—Franck's Quintet and the Final Kneisel Concert—Miss Goodson and Mr. Clement in Recitals of Their Own

THERE are no Symphony Concerts next week, since Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra make their final journey for the season to New York and the neighboring cities. The conductor, moreover, will then take leave of the public that for four years has received him gladly in them. Here at home, the major concert of the week is that of the Cecilia on Thursday evening, in Symphony Hall, when, under its new leader, Mr. Mees, it will sing choral pieces, without orchestra, from Bach, Verdi, Cornelius, and Mr. Loeffler. Furthermore, Mr. Slezak, the tenor, and Mme. Gluck, will assist for singers of distinction who have already given their pleasure here. On Tuesday evening, in Steinert Hall, the Kneisel Quartet ends its present series of concerts here, with Miss Goodson, the pianist, to assist it in Franck's beautiful quintet. Miss Goodson herself announces a recital for Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon, to renew the pleasure of her playing, and in the same room, on Tuesday afternoon, Mr. Clément will sing pieces by Bizet, Berlioz and Offenbach, with an artistry that distinguishes him among French tenors.

/ / * / /

Symphony Hall: The Cecilia, Mr. Slezak and Miss Gluck

AGAIN, under its new conductor, Mr. Mees, and with two such assisting singers as Mr. Slezak and Mme. Gluck of the Metropolitan Opera House, the Cecilia will prove its new mettle at its second and final concert of the season at Symphony Hall on Thursday evening. At the first concert in January Mr. Mees was restoring the choir to its former efficiency and finesse and reinvigorating its spirit. He has been diligent in the task in the interval and now he and it may prove their progress in exacting pieces. No orchestra will assist the society next Thursday, and the chosen pieces range more widely than they have in previous miscellaneous concerts of the Cecilia. Some, indeed, are distinctly light. The others comprise a motet from Bach, a hymn from Verdi, and two eight-part choruses, one from Cornelius, the other Mr. Loeffler's setting of Parsons's ode "To One Who Fell in Battle." Mr. Slezak, whom Boston has known as a singing-actor in the Opera House and whom it has lately discovered as a concert singer of agreeable voice, adroit artistry and sentimental charm, needs no recalling. Mme. Gluck, too, has proved her worth at the Symphony Concerts, where voice, vocal skill and quick feeling commended her. In all they will sing many pieces. The full programme is:

Motet, "Praise the Lord, All Ye Heathen" (Psalm CXVII.) ..... Bach
The Cecilia Society.

Songs:
Salomo ..... Hermann
Verschwiegene Liebe ..... Wolf
Die Loreley ..... Liszt
Ashes of Roses ..... Woodman
Ecstasy ..... Rummel
Mr. Slezak.

Hymn to the Virgin Mary ..... Verdi
Women's Voices of the Cecilia Society.

Songs:
Rossignols amoureux ..... Rameau
La Colomba ..... Schindler
Warnung ..... Mozart
Mme. Gluck.

"Liebe Dir Ergeb Ich Mich" (Chorus in eight parts) ..... Cornelius
The Cecilia Society.

"For One Who Fell in Battle" (Chorus in eight parts) ..... Loeffler
The Cecilia Society.

Assad's Narrative from "The Queen of Sheba" ..... Goldmark
Mr. Slezak.

Tomorrow (Trio for Women's Voices) ..... Foote
Spring Delight ..... Cui
The Cecilia Society.

Songs:
Song of the Shepherd Lehl.—Chant-Hindu ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Psyché ..... Paladilhe
My Laddie ..... Thayer
Mme. Gluck.

Hunting Song ..... Benedict
Netherland Folk-Song ..... Kremser
The Cecilia Society.

HERALD

MARCH 16, 1912

BACHAUS PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Pianist Is Soloist at the 19th Public Rehearsal of Orchestra.

STRAUSS IS FEATURED

Domestic Symphony Heard Again—Performance Is Impressive.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Wilhelm Bachaus was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuetz" ..... Weber
Symphonia Domestica ..... Strauss
Concerto in E-flat major, No. 5 ..... Beethoven

There are some who characterize the Domestic Symphony as abominable, because, forsooth, it reveals the composer as a colossal egoist. And so there are also some who cry out against Walt Whitman because he began his "Leaves of Grass": "I celebrate myself," and cannot endure Montaigne on account of his "egotism." There are many who take this symphony too seriously. Among them is Mr. C. L. Graves of the Spectator, who really thinks that music died with the passing of Johannes Brahms. Mr. Graves is thought in England to have a pretty wit, and he himself would admit, if he were pressed, that he is a funny man, but he is never so amusing as when he berates the modern composers and all those who admire them. According to Mr. Graves, the composer of the "Domestic Symphony" is deliberately eccentric, a self-advertiser, one who turns his family into copy for the purpose of making the bourgeois sit up.

Grant that all said about Strauss is true; what, pray, has it to do with his music? This music is either good or bad. It is effective and engrossing, or it is dull. It is eloquent or it is prosy. Who cares whether the household in which this musical life passed was that of Strauss, or of a neighbor, or an imaginary household?

Then there is this question of an explanatory program. When Strauss was in New York in 1904 when the symphony was produced, he said that he wished the work to be taken as "music for what it is, and not as the elaboration of the specific details of a scheme of things." When the symphony was first played in Europe—at Frankfort—he allowed the publication of only a few notes, which pointed out the themes typical of husband, wife and child and named the themes of the double fugue. But in 1905 when the symphony was performed in London, an elaborate analysis by Messrs. Kalisch and Pitt appeared and the hearer of the music was then able to identify the child in its bath and tell when the dispute arose between the parents concerning the future of the boy. Was Strauss consenting? Or did he with mistaken humor stuff his friends who were happy to extract sunbeams from cucumbers?

What matters it? There are beautiful and noble pages in this symphony, as in the "Love Scene," so called. The double fugue would be dramatic and exciting even if there were no thought of labels "Assertion" and "Contrary Assertion" attached to the two subjects. The child's theme, charming in its simplicity, may be taken as any motive for subsequent and elaborate treatment. This symphony holds the attention from the beginning to the end.

The pleasure of the hearer who seeks no "explanation" other than that given by the title is purer and keener than that of him who is endeavoring to follow a story. Here is an instance, one of many, where a program to be read while the music is playing is a hindrance and a nuisance. Let the hearer listen to the music as music. Let him dream the dreams suggested by it. They may be even more fantastical than the thoughts which, as some say, inspired the composer.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra gave an unusually impressive performance of this symphony, one that put the work in the most favorable light, so that even doubting Thomases were inclined to be enthusiastic.

What would conductors do without the three familiar overtures of Weber? They are to them in time of perplexity what "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" are to opera managers. And yet, in spite of countless performances, the overture to "Der Freischuetz" is not stale. The part song for the horns still charms the ear, although it is now associated with "When the sun glorious" and other "sacred" words for service in the meeting house. The Samiel motive is still dramatically sinister and brings back memories of the red-cloaked fiend as we have seen him on the German stage. And the clarinet theme, typical of Max, is still worthy of the famous praise of Berlioz. When there is talk of this overture there is frequently a reference to an article about it written by Douglas Jerrold. Was this article ever republished in an edition of Jerrold's works? Has any one now living ever read it?

The spirited performance of the overture awoke unusually hearty and protracted applause.

Mr. Bachaus, who is known to his family and Europeans as Backhaus, gave a recital here last January. The audience was a small one, and it is said that the pianist was then so chagrined and chilled that he could not do himself justice. His playing was then technically smooth and polished, but his interpretation was singularly lukewarm. Yesterday his performance of the concerto was thoughtful, well proportioned, free from affectation in the reading, without any attempt at self-glorification. The hearer sat in a respectful attitude. He was calm. And when it was all over he felt like asking: "Is that all?" He gladly acknowledged the clearness, fluency, and sanity of the performance, but he missed poetical and emotional expression. Take for instance the faint suggestions of the Rondo theme, a little passage that only the greater Beethoven could have conceived. Mr. Bachaus made little of it. And even the Rondo did not have the defiant brilliance that some pianists of less mechanical proficiency are able to give to it. Mr. Bachaus was warmly applauded.

There will be no Symphony concerts next week. The program for the concerts of March 29, 30 will be as follows: Rachmaninoff, Symphony in E minor, No. 2, op. 27; Mozart, concerto for violin and orchestra, D major, No. 4 (Mr. Sylvain Noack, violinist); Mendelssohn, overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

[170]

EVE. TELEGRAM

ress New York City.

te MAR 22 1912

FOR the first of his two valedictory appearances here Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had the stellar honors all to himself last night in Carnegie Hall.

Mme. Louise Homer, who was to have been a special soloist, had a bad cold and did not wander from her fireside and her babies.

The big audience which is invariably on hand when the big band from Boston plays greeted Mr. Fiedler with unrestrained enthusiasm. It was a tribute not only to the present concert but to the long list of superb programmes which Mr. Fiedler has planned and presented.

There were no scores in front of Mr. Fiedler last night. Entirely by his unfaltering memory he led the many players, like one multicolored voice through the stately Leonora overture, No. 3, by Beethoven, easily scaled the Alpine heights of Brahms' First Symphony, and then presented Wagner's three mighty overtures, to "Tannhauser," to "Lohengrin" and to "the Meistersingers of Nuremberg."

When all this wealth of music had been nobly articulated the audience renewed its ovations, and sent Mr. Fiedler and the Boston players out into the cold night with a warm sense of being fully appreciated here.

EVENING WORLD

From

New York

Address

MAR 22 1912

Date

Fiedler Leads Boston Players In Fine Concert

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

MAX FIEDLER conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the first of its last two concerts in New York for the season at Carnegie Hall last night with something that savored of magic. Never has this premier band of America showed its quality so superlatively. It played as if inspired. Mr. Fiedler is to take his leave of us at the concert by the Bostonians of to-morrow afternoon. Next season another hand, that of Dr. Karl Muck, for whom we have profound admiration, will direct the organization. Meanwhile, in all good faith, we may be permitted to pay our tribute of admiration to the departing conductor.

It was rather cruel of Mr. Fiedler to select Brahms's first symphony as his principal number, because it is to be one of the features of the Brahms festival of next week by our own Symphony and Oratorio societies, and why invite comparison? It was played in a manner so impressive that it will not soon be forgotten. The other numbers were Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3; Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture and the same great master's preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Die Meistersinger," all pronounced with crispness, fine balance, exquisite tone and commanding sonority.

Louise Homer had been announced as the soloist, but because of illness she could not appear. The "Meistersinger" prelude, therefore, was substituted for the Liszt and Debussy arias that she was to sing. The house was crowded to overflowing, as is always the case when the Boston Orchestra plays.

EVENING JOURNAL,

From New York City.

Address MAR 23 1912

Date

Fiedler Surrenders Leadership of Boston Orchestra To-morrow

By IRVING WEIL.

The somewhat austere atmosphere that invades Carnegie Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra each month was largely tinged by a well-bred but nevertheless enthusiastic warmth last night when the auditorium full of men and women gave expression to a kindly feeling of approval and regret—approval of the labors of Max Fiedler during the past four years as a conductor of the orchestra and regret at his farewell to the Thursday evening subscribers.

This season brings Mr. Fiedler's leadership of the orchestra to an end, his last appearance in New York at the head of the band will take place at the final concert on Saturday afternoon. Already the programme books announce next season's series of concerts with Dr. Karl Muck as conductor.

When Mr. Fiedler entered to take his place at the conductor's desk the audience burst into applause. Women, especially, become almost glove-splitting in their attempt to show Conductor Fiedler that they were sorry he was going and the applause was continued for some minutes, with the conductor apparently much moved at the demonstration.

Mr. Fiedler chose to make his last appearance in New York as the interpreter of Beethoven, Weber, Brahms, Wagner and Richard Strauss. Strauss and Weber being reserved for the Saturday afternoon concert. Last night he played the "Leonore" No. 3 overture, the Brahms First Symphony, the "Tannhauser" overture and the "Lohengrin" and "Meistersinger" preludes. The "Meistersinger" prelude was added to take the place of numbers that were to have been sung by Mme. Louise Homer who, however, had a cold and could not appear.

Mr. Fiedler plays Brahms with much eloquence and it was a particularly ingratiating reading of the score of the First Symphony that he gave last night. Its spirit of gentle but solemn optimism was proclaimed without undue stress and its many passages of great lyric beauty received tender interpretation. The Wagner numbers were distinguished by great clarity and sufficient fervor.

From AMERICAN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

FAREWELL CONCERT PLEASES

Boston Symphony and Louise Homer Greeted by Large Audience.

All the seats in the Lyric Theater were in demand last evening by Baltimore music lovers, who went to hear the closing concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its popular and able director, Max Fiedler. The standing room was also taken to greet him, as well as to hear the very fine program, which embraced the principal schools of modern music, as follows:

Beethoven—Overture, Leonora, No. 3, Op. 72.
Brahms—Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.
I.—Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II.—Andante sostenuto.
III.—Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV.—Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Liszt.....The Loreley
Wagner.....Prelude to Lohengrin
Debussy—Recitative and Aria of Lia, from L'Enfant Prodigue.
Richard Strauss—Tone Poem, Death and Transfiguration, Op. 24.

Mme. Louise Homer was the soloist, and she achieved another triumph such as she and everybody else expected. In the perfection of her fine stage presence and her incomparable mezzo voice, she easily sways the musical multitude, who are never obliged to conjure up any apologies on her account. She was alike successful in the now old and familiar Loreley of Liszt and the more modern aria by Debussy.

Mr. Fiedler's triumph was in all the scoools of music. The Beethoven overture was as dramatic and impressive as ever. The Brahms Symphony No. 1 has not been surpassed since the days of Beethoven, whose work it so strongly resembits that when it was first heard he was immediately nominated as the real successor of Beethoven, and that the greatest master's musical mantle had fallen on a worthy follower.

Another triumph for Mr. Fiedler and the superb orchestra was in the rendition of the Wagner Prelude to Lohengrin. The musical abridgment recalls the whole beautiful opera and is still the success with the public that it was when first given to the world.

Mr. Fiedler concluded his great valedictory concert by the Richard Strauss tone poem, Death and Transfiguration, thus showing his mastery over the latest school of musical composers. Baltimore lovers of music will long remember the many musical treats Max Fiedler has given them, and he will carry with him abroad the best wishes of all this community who love "the most refining of all the arts."

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date MAR 21 1912

It is a coincidence that the coming nine days in New York will see both the "Manon" revival and Max Fiedler's farewell. For it was in the same season as this opera's previous revival, four years ago, that the veteran conductor came to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the absence of Muck.

"Bostonian Fiedler the Man for New York," ran the headlines then. The scrapbooks of the day echo with the "rugged clarity and honesty" of the quiet old fellow from Hamburg, who somehow, to our audiences, looked like Theodore Thomas come back again. Nobody ever paid, Maurice Grau said, to watch a conductor's back.

But Carnegie Hall is sold out to the doors on Saturday afternoon for Mr. Fiedler's "going away" party. He is the lone star then. To-night C. A. Ellis presents his last soloist of the year, Louise Homer, the American star of "Mona."

From TIMES

Address Washington, D.C.

Date MAR 20 1912

Estab

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CLOSES SEASON IN CAPITAL

Madame Homer Heard at Her Best in Operatic Excerpts.

Closing its season of 1911-12 in a blaze of glory, the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday played before a crowded house in the New National Theater. This was the fifth and final performance given by the great New England organization, and it was also the last time that Washington will have the pleasure of listening to a symphony program conducted by Mr. Fiedler, as he is to be succeeded next season by Dr. Karl Muck, who was his immediate predecessor in the same post. Mr. Fiedler had decreed a Wagnerian program for the afternoon, with Mme. Louise Homer as the soloist of the occasion. This was a happy choice, for Mr. Fiedler is better, perhaps, in the interpretation of Wagner than at any thing else, and the famous dramatic soprano excelled when singing the operatic excerpts which she prefers.

The program opened with the prelude to the "Meistersingers of Nuremburg," which is a broadly developed overture in the classical form. This was followed by the "Lohengrin" Prelude, which was better known to yesterday's auditors as a thematic development of the Sangreal motif. Then after that arrangement of all the Siegfried motives, known as the "Siegfried Funeral Music," Fiedler led his men into the prelude and love death of "Tristan and Isolde." This famous music has never been better interpreted in Washington than at the National Theater yesterday, nor were its numerous melodies ever better blended and at the same time all made to sing separately at Mr. Fiedler's inspiring direction.

The other orchestral numbers were the "Siegfreid Idyll," which Wagner wrote in celebration of the birth of his son, and the familiar "Tannhauser" Overture. Madame Homer sang the "Just God" scene, and the aria, "My Life Fades in its Blossom," from "Rienzi," act II. In the second half of the program she was heard to better advantage in the Waltraute scene from the Gotterdammerung, where Waltraute implores Brunnhilde to return the lawful guardians to the Ring of the Rhine Daughters. Madame Homer was in superb voice yesterday, and her selections gave full opportunity to display that charm depth of feeling which is so noticeable in her work.

While the orchestra reached its apex in the "Tristan and Isolde" music, Mr. Fiedler and his men showed at all times the breadth of sympathy and well-nigh perfect musicianship which have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it has been for these many years. JULIA MURDOCK.

From WORLD

New York

Address

MAR 22 1912

Date

Estab

MAX FIEDLER BIDS FAREWELL TO NEW YORK

Boston Symphony Leader Receives Demonstration at Hands of Carnegie Hall Audience.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three years past and who shortly leaves to take up other work in Europe, was the recipient of a demonstration in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Fiedler was making his final appearance here at an evening concert by the Boston musicians, and the very large assemblage made a distinct fuss over him.

When he first appeared upon the stage the retiring conductor was fairly overwhelmed by long-continued and spontaneous hand-clapping. After the Brahms C minor symphony Mr. Fiedler was recalled time and again, and at the close of the programme people remained standing for minutes paying their respects to the popular musician. Even the box occupants joined in the unusual enthusiasm. The musical director will lead to-morrow's Boston Symphony matinee, which marks his last bow.

The playing of the orchestra was beyond anything previously offered this year, despite the excellent achievements already to its credit. For sheer beauty of tone, shading, perfection of technical precision and other essentials to superlative endeavors of a great orchestral body, the Boston organization was unexcelled.

Besides the Brahms number, the Beethoven "Leonore" overture No. 3, the "Tannhaeuser" overture and the preludes to both "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger" were given Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera company, who was to have sung, was prevented by a cold from appearing.

From SUN

Address New York

Date MAR 22 1912

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Great Playing Heard at Last Evening Concert of Its Season.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The large audience made it the occasion of signal demonstrations of approval of Max Fiedler, the conductor, who to-morrow afternoon will direct the orchestra for the last time in this city. When he appeared on the stage last evening he was received with a salvo of applause which lasted fully three minutes. After the symphony Mr. Fiedler was recalled several times and after he had caused the orchestra to rise to acknowledge the plaudits he and his men were kept on their feet for several minutes.

The programme of last evening's entertainment was disarranged by the sudden illness of Mme. Homer of the opera, who was to have been the solo singer. Her two numbers were omitted and the orchestral pieces remained. These were Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Brahms's symphony in C minor, the overture to "Tannhäuser," prelude to "Lohengrin" and vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

This is not the occasion for a summing up of Mr. Fiedler's admirable qualities nor are essays on the Brahms symphony needed. It was played Monday evening by the Minneapolis orchestra. It will be played next week by Mr. Damrosch and early in April by the London Symphony Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch. Last Monday, as last evening, it was preceded by the "Leonore" overture and Mr. Nikisch will preface it with the same great work

The performance of the Beethoven overture last evening was solid and excellent, but it was not the grand proclamation of the concert. This came with the symphony From beginning to end its performance was one of the most notable ever heard in New York. Flawless beauty of tone, perfect balance of the instrumental parts, absolute precision and an orchestral cantilena of matchless smoothness were the striking technical merits of this performance. But these mechanical excellences were the means by which a noble and indeed majestic delivery of the symphony was brought about. In the last movement the interpretation rose to such a height as almost to justify the use of the most exclusive of all adjectives, sublime. At any rate it was a glorious and inspiring performance of one of the mightiest masterpieces of orchestra music, and with the memory of it in mind the Thursday evening subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts will cherish kind thoughts of Max Fiedler.

From CITIZENS

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date MAR 22 1912

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO-NIGHT.

Its Last Concert of Season at the Academy.

The lecture recital preliminary to to-night's final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music was given by Carl Fique yesterday afternoon. He discussed and presented piano illustrations of the programme in which the orchestra will be heard to-night, and which will be the last appearance in Brooklyn of Max Fiedler as conductor, for he goes back to Germany, and Karl Muck will be the orchestra's conductor next season.

In noting the numbers to be played Mr. Fique said: "It is evident that Mr. Fiedler made the selection a personal one, and very happily so, for the titles point back to Germany. There is the 'Der Freischuts' overture, the 'Symphonia Domestica,' the 'Lorelei,' the 'Siegfried Idyl,' the overture to 'Leonore,' all dear to the German heart and by German composers. There is just one French composer, and even he sings the return of the prodigal. But there is a mistake, Mr. Fiedler does not return as such, but goes home with honor, as one who has done noble work in bringing compositions of great masters to the American public."

Much time was given to the "Domestica." In picking out motifs, Mr. Fique showed three, representing the man, woman and child, evidently a happy family, to judge from the music. "At first the woman motif seems to lead," said he, "and to have the last word, until really at the very last, the man motif dominates. There, you can judge for yourself," said he, with a merry twinkle, as he played the closing chords and looked out over his audience, where the women shook their heads in decided negative, while the men clapped vigorously, and all laughed.

Programme numbers are: Overture to the opera, "Der Freitschutz" (Weber); "Symphonia Domestica," in one movement, opus 53 (Strauss); "The Lorelei" (Liszt); "A Siegfried Idyl" (Wagner); recititive and aria of Lia, from "L'Enfant Prodigue" (Debussy), and the overture "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72 (Beethoven). Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, will be the soloist.

[17]

From EVENING MAIL

Address New York

Date

MUSIC.

Estab

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

Last night at Carnegie Hall the vast audience that heard the last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season experienced mixed emotions, and, notwithstanding the extreme beauty of the offerings, there was much besides pleasure that made itself felt. In the first place, there was keen disappointment over the announcement that Mme. Homer was too ill to fulfill her engagement as soloist of the evening, as this rare artist is heard seldom on the concert stage during the time that she is engrossed in opera.

It was also the last but one appearance of Max Fiedler as conductor of this great orchestra, which he has kept up to its standard as the greatest orchestra of the world during his term of service, which he took temporarily. Mr. Fiedler was made aware of the very great esteem in which he is held,as there was long and loud applause every time he came to the platform and after every number, but applause does not mean everything, unless it is also remembered that this audience represents the cream of musical connoisseurs and music lovers of the city, whose appreciation of the conductor grew as he demonstrated his worth in the musical life of this country.

Mr. Fiedler is not only an able man; he is a great and sincere musician, one who commands respect. He is leaving a circle of admirers, and there is only gratitude for what he has given us and regret that a place might not have been made for him in New York, where a man with just his equipment and following might have meant much to the musical situation.

The programme opened with a charming reading of the third "Leonore" overture, and one of the most effective and intelligent readings of the Brahms first symphony that we have ever been permitted to hear. Mr. Fiedler has indeed given us great joy in his Brahms readings. The second part of the programme was devoted to Wagner, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was played instead of Mme. Homer's numbers.

The Domestic symphony, by Richard Strauss will occupy a large proportion of the programme to-morrow afternoon, when Mr. Fiedler will take his leave of New York audiences. Mr. Witek, concert master, was not in his chair last night, as he was suffering from indisposition.

From STANDARD UNION

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

CARL FIQUE'S CLOSING LECTURE RECITAL.

Carl Fique gave the closing lecture on the programme of the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in lecture hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon. He discussed and presented piano illustrations of the programme in which the orchestra will be heard to-night in the opera house of the building, the last for the season, and also the last which Max Fiedler will conduct. He goes back to Germany, and Karl Muck will again be the orchestra's conductor next season. In noting the numbers to be played, Mr. Fique said: "It is evident that Mr. Fiedler made the selection a personal one, and very happily so, for the titles point back to Germany. There is the 'Der Freischuts' Overture, the 'Symphonia Domestica,' the 'Loreley,' the 'Siegfried Idyl,' the overture to 'Leonore,' all dear to the German heart and by German composers. There is just one French composer, and even he sings the return of the prodigal. But there is a mistake. Mr. Fiedler does not return as such, but goes home with honor, as one who has done noble work in bringing compositions of great masters to the American public."

This was warmly applauded by the audience, made up mainly of subscribers to the concerts.

Much time was given to the "Domestica." In picking out motifs, Mr. Fique showed three, representing the man, woman and child, evidently a happy family, to judge from the music. "At first the woman motif seems to lead," said he, "and to have the last word, until really at the very last—the man motif dominates. There you can judge for yourself," said he, with a merry twinkle, as he played the closing chords and looked out over his audience, where the women shook their heads in decided negative, while the men clapped vigorously, and they all laughed.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York

Date

MUSIC

Esta

The Boston Orchestra.

Circumstances alter cases; the truth of that axiom was probably conceded by every living soul thousands of years ago. It might be perfectly proper to deplore the fact that when the Boston Orchestra gave its last evening concert at Carnegie Hall and offered New York at least its sixth hearing of the "Leonore No. 3" overture, somebody should have wished that the repertory of our orchestral conductors were not so circumscribed, especially since the overture is set down for still another hearing by the London Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch next month. So also with the first symphony by Brahms, which was performed for the fourth time this season, and is announced for two more performances—one by the Symphony Society under Walter Damrosch, and another by Mr. Nikisch and the foreign visitors. But, as has been said, circumstances alter cases. It is scarcely conceivable that anybody who heard the two works performed last night felt the slightest twinge of disappointment or resentment. There was too much calling for gratitude at the puissant and all-compelling eloquence of the performance of both works—especially of the symphony, which from every point of view took its place alongside of the superb interpretation of the same composer's fourth symphony which Mr. Fiedler and his men gave early in the season. Of the numbers which followed, nothing need be said. Mme. Homer was to have sung Listz's "Loreley" and an air from Debussy's "L'Enfant prodigue"; but Mme. Homer had a cold and could not sing and in place of the vocal numbers Mr. Fiedler gave his audience (which could not have been larger had there been a dozen sensational solo performers) the prelude to "Meistersinger." So after the opening numbers we had the introductions to three operas which form a part of the backbone of our repertory at the Metropolitan Opera House—"Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger." It is delightful, of course, to hear these pieces played by the musicians from Boston, but it is more delightful to hear them in their proper surroundings, and in those we hear them so often that they might well make place for something else in symphonic concerts. Why will orchestra conductors persist in exhibiting such a testimonium paupertatis?

It was an evening of triumph for Mr. Fiedler, whose departure from America is sincerely deplored by the patrons of the Boston Orchestra in New York. He had a superb welcome on his entrance, was called and recalled to receive demonstrations of enthusiasm after every number and at the close was applauded to the echo.

H. E. K.

From HERALD

Address New York

Date

Great Farewell for Mr. Fiedler

Esta

Conductor of Boston Symphony in Last Night Here Leads Brilliant Concert.

Indisposition and cold did their utmost last night to wreck the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert, in Carnegie Hall, but they were foiled. Mme. Louise Homer, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who was to have been the soloist, succumbed in the afternoon to a severe cold, and a placard was printed and hung in the lobby of Carnegie Hall advising the audience of her inability to sing. Mr. Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, also fell a victim to the prevailing sample of spring weather and could not appear. His place was taken by Mr. S. Noack. No one replaced Mme. Homer. In place of her two solos the orchestra played the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

It was the last evening concert that Mr. Max Fiedler conducted here, as he is to return to Europe after this season and his place is to be taken by Dr. Carl Muck. When Mr. Fiedler apeared last night, applause began which lasted fully five minutes, while he bowed and bowed. He was quite overcome by the reception and took a brief time in which to compose himself before he began Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 3 Overture. At the close of the concert the scene was repeated, only more enthusiastically, bany in the audience crowding about the platform to wish him farewell. He was recalled many times and when he made the orchestra stand up to share in the honors, men and conductor were cheered.

The concert was one of the music season's high lights. The manner in which Brahms' First Symphony was conducted and played was breath-taking for beauty and dramatic effect. So, too, was the Beethoven, overture magnificently done, and then came three of Wagner's preludes, to "Lohengrin," "Tannhaeuser" and "Mastersingers," all triumps of orchestral virtuosity. Mr. Fiedler's real farewall takes place to-morrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

FAREWELL TO FIEDLER

Estal

Last Boston Symphony Of The Season Rendered.

LEADER IS GIVEN AN OVATION

Mme. Louise Homer, As The Soloist, Is Applauded—Reading Wanting In Vitality.

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of this season, which was also the farewell concert of Mr. Max Fiedler, the conductor of the organization, took place last evening at the Lyric before an unusually large audience.

Madame Louise Homer appeared as soloist. The program was as follows:

Overture—Leonora, No. 3, Op. 72.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.....Brahms
(a) Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
(b) Andante sostenuto.
(c) Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
(d) Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
The Loreley.....Liszt
Prelude to Lohengrin.....Wagner
Recitative and Arria of Lia, from L'Enfant Prodigue.....Debussy
Tone poem, Death and Transfiguration, Op. 24, Strauss

Enthusiasm on the part of the audience, intended as a token of regret at Mr. Fiedler's going, was one of the essential features of the evening, for only on that ground could the enthusiasm be accounted for. In a symphony concert, the symphony itself is the main point, and this, if nothing else, should be given in such a manner that the most complete satisfaction should prevail. But unfortunately the last symphonic production by Mr. Fiedler was anything but interesting. Only by comparison can correct judgment be formed, and when considered in the light of comparison with a recent performance of the same symphony, last evening's production was dull and tiresome to a degree.

The notes, of course, were reproduced according to the score, but the reading was wanting in fire, in vitality and in imagination. Conventional, without any display of tone coloring and with but little dynamic variation, the smyphony wended its weary way onward, until the nd was finally reached, and the audience rendered to the conductor its signal or regret at his approaching departure.

Brahms, to be interesting must be thoroughly well played, and last night's performance would hardly serve to endear him to a general music-loving public.

The "Lohengrin" Prelude received a much more forceful and vital reading, the great crescendos being admirably achieved. While the Strauss "Tone Poem" was well interpreted, the work was not as significantly presented as it has been heard on the same orchestra.

Mme. Homer is a singer who has not been heard in Baltimore as often as local musiclovers would like, on account of several disappointments she has inflicted on the public in recent years. But she has a really fine voice of great volume, compass and of a rich, full quality. That she did not sing any operatic airs, which lose by being presented without stage accessories, speaks much for her artistic perception of the fitness of things. She gave a striking and forceful reading of "The Loreley," which requires an orchestral background in order to make it thoroughly effective. Her singing of Debussy's opera-oratorio aria was splendid and made the audience regret that unbreakable rule of the organization, that no encores shall be given. The Debussy work was far more interesting, dating from the time that preceeded his composition of atmospheric nothings. W. G. O.

HERR FIEDLER REGRETS IT

Finds Musical Taste Of Baltimore On The Increase.

Before leaving his hotel last night to lead the last concert of the season in this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, who will no longer direct that musical organization after this winter, sat for a few minutes in the lobby of the Stafford and mused over his many visits to Baltimore.

"During four seasons," said Herr Fiedler, "I have directed 20 concerts in this city. They were well attended from the start. But, year by year, I have noticed an immense increase in the audiences. The taste for the kind of musical compositions produced by the orchestra has grown wonderfully among Baltimoreans in the last few years. We have always looked forward to our visits here, knowing our efforts would be appreciated."

Asked if, during his many visits to Baltimore, he had made many friendships, the great conductor answered:

"What time have I had to form friendships? I con e from New York this afternoon—tonight I lead the orchestra—tomorrow morning I am gone. However, I would like to say I have become very friendly with two of your art collectors—Dr. George Reuling and Mr. Joseph Pache, director of the Oratorio Society. They both have excellent collections of old art and I have greatly enjoyed inspecting their treasures. I regret it will perhaps be a long time before I see them again."

From EVENING GLOBE,

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 1912

Fiedler Begins His Farewells to New York

Conducts First in Final Pair of Boston Symphony Concerts at Carnegie Hall—Enthusiastically Applauded by Great Audience—Opera Notes.

Max Fiedler conducted the first in his final pair of New York concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, for, as announced long ago, at the end of the present season Mr. Fiedler retires from the conductorship of the Boston Band, after four years of service, to be succeeded by Dr. Karl Muck, who preceded him. The programme planned for this occasion consisted of Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's first symphony, Liszt's song, "The Loreley," the prelude to "Lohengrin," Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's cantata "L'Enfant Prodigue," and the overture to "Tannhäuser," with Mrs. Homer as soloist. A severe cold, however, laid its restraining hand upon Mrs. Homer, and Mr. Fiedler was forced to remodel the programme without her. He reversed the order of the Wagner numbers already selected and added after them the "Meistersinger" prelude. Notice of the change appeared on green slips inserted in the programmes. In spite of it the audience was not only one of the largest Carnegie Hall has ever held, but one of the most enthusiastic.

The "Leonore" overture began dramatically, but soon lapsed into orthodox conservatism. Those remembering how the Minneapolis orchestra disposed of the self-same overture and the self-same symphony, standing likewise first and second on their programme, Monday night, might have wished for just the excess energy that tore some things to tatters on that occasion. It would have made Mr. Fiedler's reading as vividly dramatic as it set out to be. But with the Brahms symphony Mr. Fiedler came into his own. Indeed, he fairly outdid himself. Rarely does any conductor make so much of the allegretto as he did, and the glorious finale was played gloriously.

There was also a performance of memorable brilliancy, the playing of a virtuoso orchestra on its mettle, for the "Tannhäuser" overture. Flawless in its loveliness was the ethereal opening of the prelude to "Lohengrin," and majestic the finely wrought climax. If something of poetry was lacking in the lyrical portion of the "Meistersinger" prelude, the opening and closing were truly magnificent in their pomp and power of sound. Judged as a whole, it was a performance to show the uninitiated why the Boston Symphony Orchestra enjoys the prestige it does, and no better compliment can be paid a retiring conductor than such playing.

There was a great greeting for Mr. Fiedler when he entered, and at the end of the Brahms symphony it seemed as if the applause would never cease, even after the conductor had bidden his men arise (headed by Mr. Noack in the first concert master's place). At the end of the concert there was another great demonstration, and again Mr. Fiedler bade his men arise. It was observed that for this occasion Mr. Fiedler dispensed entirely with scores, conducting every piece from memory. But that achievement is becoming so usual now that soon it will hardly be deemed worthy of remark.

POST,

From

Washington, D. C.

Address

Da

THE last of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season attracted a large audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff occupied a box, and had as their guests, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Representative and Mrs. A. P. Gardner, and Count du Monceau, of the Belgian legation. Mrs. Leiter entertained in her box the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, Mrs. Charles E. Hughes, Mrs. Beale, and Miss Stevens. Mrs. James McMillan also had a box party, her guests including Mme. von Haniel, Viscountess d'Azy, and Mrs. Preston Gibson. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had with her in her box Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Miss Branahan, Miss Sargent, and Miss Winslow. Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner and Mrs. I. T. Mann also had box parties.

Among others in the audience were Mrs. John Hay, Mr. and Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Mrs. Robert Ely, Mrs. H. H. Ward, Mrs. Henry C. Lodge, Mrs. Benjamin Hellen, Mr. Arthur Hellen, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. William F. Dennis, Mrs. Charles Nelson Riker, Mrs. McKim, Mrs. W. B. Ridgely, and Mrs. Charles J. Bell.

[172]

From PRESS

Address New York

Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA FORCED TO PLAY WITHOUT SOLOIST

Wagner Numbers Substituted for Louise Homer's Songs.

CONTRALTO TOO ILL TO APPEAR

Fiedler Greeted with Enthusiasm on Last Thursday Night He Will Direct Here.

Many persons who journeyed to Carnegie Hall last night for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last Thursday evening concert of the season were disappointed deeply, no doubt, at the unexpected announcement that Louise Homer, the Metropolitan Opera Company contralto, was prevented by a severe cold from making her appearance as soloist. Her unfortunate indisposition, indeed, left a serious breach in the promised programme, and compelled the management to add the "Meistersinger" prelude to the list of purely instrumental selections, which comprised also Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3, Brahms's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, the "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Tannhaeuser" overture, in order to make up, at least in part, for the omission of Liszt's "Loreley" and Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

However, Max Fiedler, who made his last appearance but one in Manhattan as musical director of the Boston Orchestra and waved his farewell to the Thursday subscribers, would have been the lion of the occasion under any circumstances, and so the crowd of socially distinguished listeners, accustomed to hold all demonstrative inclinations politely in check, gave itself over without reserve to honoring the excellent leader tumultuously.

For fully seven minutes Fiedler was compelled to face the applauding throng when he first made his entrance before he could ask his men to begin the immortal Beethoven overture. After the Brahms symphony, too, he received long-continued and noisy tributes of admiration, in which he asked every member of his band to take part, and at the end of the evening the earlier scenes were repeated. Evidently the German conductor, who is to be succeeded, as he was preceded, by Dr. Carl Muck, made many true and devoted musical friends in this city in the four years of his activity as head of America's greatest orchestra.

It is quite possible that the extraordinary reception given to him somewhat unnerved Fiedler. At any rate, candor compels the admission that the Boston Orchestra, under his direction, did not measure up to its highest standard last night in rhythmical unanimity, precision, incisiveness of attack and technical perfection.

Surely one is justified in expecting from the Boston Orchestra a more impressive performance of Brahms's symphony than from Oberhoffer's men from Minneapolis, who produced the same work only a few days ago in the same place. In dynamic balance, in euphony, in refinement of tone and nuance, indeed, last night's production was superior to the one given by the Western organization. That was particularly evident in the inspired andante. Yet in certain other respects Oberhoffer and his responsive band acquitted themselves more satisfactorily. Their attack was more vigorous, more electric in its sharpness, more electrifying in its effect; their rhythm more clerly defined. Fiedler, it seemed, missed much of the fire and force in the first movement, and did not succeed in building up an eloquent climax in the last. It was surprising, too, considering the quality of the wonderful instrument at his command, that the conductor could not make more of the andante, the fluent melodic curves of which he failed to set forth in rhythmically symmetrical and plastic phrases. M. S.

From TIMES

Address Washington, D .C.

Date MAR 2 0 19

Occupants of Boxes At Orchestra Concert.

The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff occupied a box at the last of the Boston Symphony concerts at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. With them was Congressman and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Congressman and Mrs. A. P. Gardner and Count du Monceau, of the Belgian legation.

The British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, Mrs. Charles E. Hughes, Mrs. Beale, and Miss Stevens were the guests of Mrs. Leiter in her box.

Mrs. James McMillan had with her in her box Viscountess d'Azy, Mme. Haniel, and Mrs. Preston Gibson.

Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Miss Brannahan, Miss Sargent, and Miss Winslow were in Mrs. Calderon Carlisle's box.

Others entertaining box parties were Mrs. I. T. Mann and Mrs. Lisner.

Some of those in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs Hinckley, Mrs. H. H. Ward, Mrs Henry Cleveland Perkins, Mrs. Benjamin Hellen, Arthur Hellen, Mrs. Charles J. Bell, Mrs. William Barret Ridgely, Mrs. Robert Ely, Mrs. Henry C. Lodge, Mrs. William F. Dennis, Mrs. Charles Nelson Riker, and Mrs. McKim.

Address N. Y. STAATS ZEITUNG

Date MAR 22 1912

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Als Herr Fiedler gestern Abend am Dirigentenpult erschien, begrüßte ihn minutenlanger, herzlicher Applaus, der wie eine Demonstration erklang. Es sind die letzten Konzerte der Bostoner, die Herr Fiedler hier dirigirt, da er mit dem Ende dieser Saison von Boston scheidet, woselbst er vier Jahre lang gearbeitet und ehrliche Erfolge errungen hat. Die Durchführung sämmtlicher Nummern des gestrigen Programms erwies, wie verdient die Ehrung an die Adresse des bedeutenden Dirigenten war, denn das Orchester spielte unter seiner Leitung mit dem ganzen Klangzauber und der durchgeistigten Virtuosität, die wir von diesem Meisterorchester stets erwarten.

From EVE. SUN

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 19

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTONIAN FIEDLER'S JUBILEE MISSES A 'MONA' STAR.

But Added 'Meistersinger' Brings Carnegie Hall Up-Standing, and More People Heard 'Lohengrin' Prelude Than at the Opera Itself—Homer and Orchestra End Southern Tour in a Blizzard—Matzenauer's Last Opera.

If to-morrow's "Mona" matinée is to have its American opera star again, it is probable that Max Fielder's farewell appearance over the river in Brooklyn tonight, like last evening's great jubilee of the Boston Symphony conductor in Manhattan, will have to do without a promised soloist. For since the "Mona" première last week Mrs. Louise Homer has sung daily with the Bostonians in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. At the nation's capital it was so hot that the bandsmen went like the traditional legislators in shirtsleeves (who don't exist except in stage plays), and the star in her furs simply got overheated and caught cold. Even so she tried singing in Baltimore. She thought better of such an attempt in New York.

So the Brahms First symphony was the star piece last night, as the Strauss "Symphonia Domestica" will be in the next borough this evening, as well as to-morrow again at Carnegie Hall. It isn't forgotten how Strauss, who gave the world-première of the "Domestica" in New York, left his public in the dark on one point. That was the not unimportant detail that the domestic picture of "Papa, Mamma and the Baby" was no daylight exposure of family jars, but a nocturne, a distillation of many "Evenings at Home" into one continuing midnight fantasy, ending when the clock strikes 6 in the morning.

To return to our "Brahmins," the eternal "Leonore" overture having been got over before most of last night's crowded house arrived—it was the expected that happened. The Boston Symphony virtuosos played like one man the rich, blended harmonies of the biggest symphony of modern times. Only the Alpine horn had a frog in its throat once. The Brahms "Pathetique" began in a mighty struggle and ended in a mist of rosy sounds of nature in Swiss valleys and reverent chorales in mute humanity.

The orchestra stood up with Fiedler after the audience had applauded the veteran for minutes and had cheered him to the echo. After the added "Meistersinger" overture at the evening's close, a performance worth waiting for, again the whole house rose. Such a personal ovation has greeted only Caruso's return or Parker's "Mona" première.

The "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin" overtures were in mid-career of last night's proceedings. A wag remarked that probably more people heard the "Lohengrin" vorspiel at Carnegie Hall than could possibly have arrived in time to hear it in its own place this same evening at the opera.

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date MAR 22 191

BOSTONIANS IN BRAHMS

The performance of the first Brahms symphony last night at Carnegie by the Boston Orchestra provoked comparisons with the interpretation of the same work some nights ago by the Minneapolis musicians.

The men from the Northwest put spirit, though perhaps not much discretion, into their reading. Under Max Fiedler, the Bostonians played the symphony more correctly but, as it seemed to me, in places rather coldly.

Whatever else they did, the Northwesterners did give the first and second movements a fine singing sound, which was missing in the scholarly and more orthodox rendering of that episode by the more famous orchestra.

From CALL

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date MAR 23 1912

MAX FIEDLER CHOSES FOR HIS "SCHWANNLIED" IN BROOKLYN THE "SINFONIA DOMESTICA" OF RICHARD STRAUSS, WHICH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PRESENTS WITH FINISHED DETAIL OF TREATMENT.

By Harry Chapin Plummer.

Max Fiedler, the retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said his farewell to Brooklyn, at the New Academy of Music, last night, and for his "schwannlied" chose the "Sinfonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, the performance of which by the full strength of the band from the Hub was attended by an audience that taxed the seating capacity of the big theater and included many standees. The farewell program included the overture to "Der Freischuetz," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the Beethoven overture, "Leonora No. 3," and two song numbers, given by Mme. Louise Homer, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, to orchestral accompaniment. These were Liszt's "Loreley" and Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's "Prodigal Son."

In a masterfully comprehensive manner, the Strauss symphony in one movement treats a subject that one would be disposed to regard as well nigh "impossible;" yet with a high and touching idealism (even the frequent play of humor possessing an undercurrent of loving sympathy), the composer of "Elektra," "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Der Rosenkavalier," has builded in his magnificent work a spiritualized musical commentary upon a day in the life of his family, which he, of course, regards as typical. The symphony is dedicated "Meiner lieben Frau und unserm Jungen." There were smiles, not of ridicule, but of appreciation, when, after the seven faint celesta notes indicating the rising hour, a thrilling F-sharp major 6-4 chord of muted trumpets and wood-wind, represented the cry of the waking child.

Maestro Fiedler expended upon the reading of the symphony the utmost care and thought, and the result was a detail of presentation that made its impression alike upon student and layman. Five minutes of frantic applause followed the performance, and honors were heaped upon the director after the other orchestral offerings, which were given with customary thoroughness.

Mme. Homer was welcomed with especial heartiness following the attack of illness which prevented her from singing in Manhattan on the previous evening. The familiar "Loreley" she essayed with fullness and richness of voice and exceedingly artistic phrasing; the Debussy excerpt she sang with studious regard for the complexity and strangeness of its music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date MAR 17 1912

A symphonic poem by Frederick S. Converse, the Boston composer, formerly assitant professor of music at Harvard University, was performed from the manuscript by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fielder conductor, at the concerts in Boston recently. Philip Hale said in the Herald:

"The subject is the conflict between Ormazd and Ahriman, light and darkness, whom the disciples of Zoroaster defied as the gods of good and evil; the constructive and destructive principles. As in certain other religions, the conflict will finally end in the triumph of Ormazd. The poetic idea appealed to the composer, as he informs us, on account of its picturesque expression of elemental truths; for in each one of us the two spirits are contending.

"The more salient features of this work are those that are decorative and imaginative. The music that describes the wild regret and the moaning anguish of Ahriman and the lost is not so effective—or, rather, it was not so effectively brought out yesterday—as the episode of

From EVENING STAR

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT LYRIC

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the farewell appearance of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra will take place at the Lyric Theater tomorrow night at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, and the program is as follows:

Beethoven—
Overture, Leonora, No. 2.
Brahms—
Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Liszt—
Song with orchestra, The Loreley.
Wagner—
Prelude to Lohengrin.
Debussy—
Lia's Aria from The Prodigal Son.
Strauss—
Death and Transfiguration.

From TIMES

Address New York

Date MAR 22 191

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Great Enthusiasm at Last of Evening Concerts This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, on its last visit of the season to New York, gave the first of its two concerts last evening in Carnegie Hall. At these concerts Mr. Fiedler makes his last appearances here as conductor of the orchestra, as his engagement in Boston ends with the present season. The fact was recognized by the audience last evening, which gave Mr. Fiedler long and enthusiastic applause as he came upon the platform. It had occasion through the evening to renew this enthusiasm repeatedly, for the performance, both Mr. Fiedler's part in it and that of his men, was of such magnificence as this wonderful organization has rarely given in all the glorious years of its history. There was a renewed demonstration in his honor at the close of the concert, and he was made to feel the esteem in which he is held here.

There was a disappointment in store for the audience, who found in their programmes, as they entered the hall, a printed slip announcing that Mme. Homer, who was to be the soloist, and sing Liszt's song, "Die Lorelei," and Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's "L-Enfant Prodigue," was unable to sing on account of a severe cold. The loss was made up by the orchestra itself; it added to the programme, which, as originally arranged, contained two preludes of Wagner's—those to "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser"—a third, that to "Die Meistersinger." And the orchestra was not a bad substitute.

The programme began with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, and the symphony was the first of the Brahms. The overture was given on this occasion for the sixth time this season, and the symphony for the fourth time; and another performance of each is coming before the end of the season. But there were no complaints, for the orchestra played both with an unequaled splendor. In Brahms's symphony, indeed, it seemed as if Mr. Fiedler and his men were inspired by the marvellous eloquence of the music. Such a performance, indeed, was a new revelation of it, and was as cogent an answer as could possibly be made to the oft-repeated charge that Brahms's instrumentation is thick, muddy, and generally disagreeable. Played with such clarity, such tonal beauty, such perfect distribution of balance between all the instrumental voices, the composer's real intentions are brought to a consummate realization, and they are disclosed as the necessary and appropriate embodiment of the musical ideas of the work.

Mr. Fiedler's reading was marked by the drastic energy, the poetry, the romantic fire that characterize the movements of this work. It was full of exquisite nuances, of finished phrasing, and more than all, in these movements he showed forth their plastic beauty of form, their symmetry and proportion, their magnificent climaxes. It was a performance of unequaled splendor.

The most cultivated, most intelligent, and most musical audience that New York can muster showed itself to be an audience of "perfect Brahmsites," as it so often has before, and was deeply stirred by the performance. Mr. Fiedler was repeatedly recalled to the platform, and finally had the orchestra rise to share with him the plaudits that were so prodigally given.

From EVENING SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date

FIEDLER'S FAREWELL

Final Concert Of Season Of Boston Symphony Orchestra At The Lyric Tonight.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the farewell appearance of Max Fiedler as its conductor take place at the Lyric tonight at 8.15 o'clock. The soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. The program is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 2....Beethoven
Symphony in C Minor, No. 1....Brahms
Song with orchestra, "The Loreley,"
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Liszt
Lia's Aria from "The Prodigal Son."
.....Wagner
"Death and Transfiguration".....Debussy
.....Strauss

From EVENING STAR,

Address Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 20 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With Mme. Louise Homer, the distinguished Wagnerian soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as its soloist and an all-Wagner program, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of its season's concerts and the last concert in which Max Fielder will officiate as its conductor, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon.

Mme. Homer was in splendid voice and sang most effectively "Just God" and "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Reinze," and Waltraute's narrative from "Gotterdammerung." The orchestral program, which was brilliantly played, included the preludes to "Die Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin," the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," a "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mr. Fielder was the recipient of a very cordial greeting at his entrance, which developed into an ovation following the Tannhauser overture. He will be succeeded as conductor of the orchestra by Dr. Karl Muck, who was his immediate predecessor.

[173]

From TELEGRAPH

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 19 1912

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the conductor, had every element likely to leave pleasant recollections for his final appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in the Academy of Music. Mr. Fiedler, with engagements to fill in the concert halls of his native land, is just now compassing the round of the cities which the band from Boston visits annually, making his devoirs and farewells. His work as an expert leader of orchestral players and accomplished reader of orchestral music has made a favorable impression on local, as well as New York and Boston, music lovers during his incumbency of the directorship of the Boston Symphony, which he is about to relinquish.

So last night he had an audience that taxed the capacity of the Academy and one which was bent on paying the tribute of appreciation, as expressed in applause, to a very able musician. For its behoof Mr. Fiedler had prepared a varied and well-rounded program, rather of the romantic in its contents.

For soloist he had selected Louise Homer, perhaps the best of American contraltos and certainly one of the greatest of all living singers. Her numbers fitted into the scheme of things admirably; that is, her choice of Liszt's setting of "The Loreley" was germane to the "Der Freischutz" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Leonora Overture No. 3," while Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue," was fit companion to the other modernistic orchestral piece, Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." Mrs. Homer was in full and rich tone last evening. As is warranted in an operatic artist, particularly in rendition of such numbers as were on her list, she exercised her dramatizing faculty very impressively, creating a "mood" that was appropriate and illusive for each piece.

The Strauss symphonic description of a day's routine in the life of a musician, with its central motives relating to "papa, mamma and baby," was given a very clarified and understanding interpretation, in which the various tonal and technical assets of the organization were displayed to fine advantage. The work took on new meanings in this reading as against that, for instance, which the composer conducted in the same auditorium in 1904.

The motival values of the Wagner Idyl were clearly differentiated, yet the blend of them in an orchestral fabric was never neglected for the sake of thematic emphasis or iteration. The reading was highly imaginative and poetic. Something of the rapture and fervor of the young romantic movement of the early years of the last century was recaptured in the Weber overture; such impassioned quality is not always conveyed by the Boston players. In finale the Beethoven overture was exquisitely performed to leave an abiding impression on the audience of the fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-seventh Philadelphia season.

From EVENING BULLETIN,

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date MAR 10 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Max Fiedler's Farewell at Last Night's Academy Concert

Max Fiedler, who is soon to return to Germany after four years' service with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared for the last time in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music last evening, when the orchestra gave its final concert of the season, with Louise Homer as soloist. In his connection with the Boston orchestra, Fiedler has done truly artistic work. He has preserved all the splendid traditions of his forerunners, and has even improved what many thought beyond improvement—the tonal quality of the orchestra's choirs and its prestige as a musical organization. Small wonder is it then that those who delight in orchestral music at its best should be sorry to see him go. Taking this point of view, the big audience that crowded the Academy last night gave the retiring conductor a reception that surely must have touched his heart, so spontaneous and so full of admiration was it. The only rift in the lute was in the program—Richard Strauss's quaint musical joke—the "Domestic Symphony"—being the piece de resistance of the evening.

Of course, there's this to be said for the work, that it gives the conductor great opportunity for personal interpretation, and in this respect Fiedler gets as much out of it as is humanly possible. Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, the "Leonore No. 3" overture of Beethoven, and the "Ziegfried Idyl," helped to relieve the strain of listening to Strauss's impossibilities.

And, too, the appearance of Homer in golden voice and mindful of the dramatic quality of every note she uttered, was an added attraction. She sang Liszt's "Loreley" and the noble recitative and aria of Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." The rendition of the latter agonized lamentation was essentially thrilling. At the end of the concert a veritable ovation was given Fiedler.

HERALD,

MARCH 10, 1912.

19TH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Since he has been in Boston Mr. Fiedler has made it a rule to play the principal tone poems of Strauss every other year. Almost exactly two years ago he played the Symphonia Domestica which two years before that had been introduced to Boston by Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler has placed this work on next week's Symphony programs and it is likely that this will be the last important performance of Strauss we shall have under his direction.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the German pianist, who is making his first tour of America, will be the soloist. He has already given a recital here. He will play this week the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven. The program will begin with the "Der Freischuetz" overture, after which will come the concerto and the program will end with the "Domestica."

TRAVELER,

MARCH 22, 1912.

CECILIA SOCIETY CLOSES THIRTY-SIXTH SEASON

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The Cecilia Society gave its second and closing concert of the season in Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Mees conducting with John P. Marshall at the organ, Benjamin Guckenberger at the piano and with Mme. Alma Gluck, soprano, and Leo Slezak, tenor, soloists. Kurt Schindler, pianist, accompanied the soloists.

The large audience present demonstrated the fact that the fine work of the society under Mr. Mees, as brought out at the January concert, had enhanced the society's reputation.

The singers were just a bit slow in finding themselves at first, and hardly did themselves justice in the Bach Motet, "Praise the Lord All Ye Heathen," with which the concert opened. But once Mr. Slezak, with his fine voice and artistry and agreeable stage presence, had stirred the enthusiasm of the audience with a group of five songs, to which he generously added an encore in response to the most enthusiastic demands, the singers could be said to be fairly on their feet and kept there the balance of the concert.

Particularly praiseworthy was the singing of the Verdi "Hymn to the Virgin" by the women, Loeffler's "For One Who Fell in Battle," the composer being obliged to rise in his seat and acknowledge the enthusiasm of the audience; Arthur Foote's "Tomorrow," after which Mr. Foote was also obliged to respond to the call of the audience; Nathan Haskell Dole's translation of the Russian "Spring Delight," Benedict's "Hunting Song" and the Netherland folksong.

Mme. Gluck fairly shared the solo honors with Mr. Slezak, both being encored and encored until their "extras" rather overshadowed the scheduled songs.

Still it is to be observed that the society's chief merit lies in promise of what it can do after better acquaintance with Mr. Mees, rather than in actual accomplishment.

MONITOR,

MARCH 16, 1912

Soprano Who Appears in Cecilia Society Concert Symphony Hall, March 21

(Copyright by Mishkin Studio, New York)

MME. ALMA GLUCK

thing, such considerations may count. But if such a proceeding is advisable, why not let the pianist play by himself and leave the orchestra out altogether. It ought to suffice to say, if the concerto form of composition is a genuine thing, that the opus 73 was presented in its character of cyclic work for piano and orchestra with commanding unity of idea.

The Symphony orchestra leaves Boston Sunday night for the last southern trip of the season. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn and a week from Monday a concert will be given in New Haven. Mme. Louise Homer will be the soloist at all of the concerts except at the Saturday matinee in New York and at the New Haven concert. Mme. Alma Gluck will be the soloist on these two occasions.

• • •

The Cecilia Society brings its season to an end next Thursday night when, with the assistance of Mme. Alma Gluck and Leo Slezak of the Metropolitan opera company of New York, it gives its second and last concert in Symphony hall. The program will be made up of solo numbers and unaccompanied part songs. Arthur Mees will conduct. The program is as follows:

Motet, "Praise the Lord All Ye Heathen" (Psalm CXVII), Bach; "Salomo," Hermann; "Verschwiegene Liebe," Hugo Wolf; "Die Lorelei," Liszt; "Ashes of Roses," Huntington Woodman; "Ecstasy," Walter Morse Rummel; Mr. Slezak. Hymn, Verdi, women's voices of the Cecilia Society. Songs, "Rossignols Amoureux," Rameau; "La Colomba," Schindler; "Warnung," Mozart; Mme. Gluck. "Liebe dir Ergeb Ich Mich" (chorus in eight parts), Cornelius; Cecilia Society. "For One Who Fell in Battle" (chorus in eight parts), Loeffler; Cecilia Society. Assad's narrative from "The Queen of Sheba," Goldmark; Mr. Slezak. "Tomorrow" (trio for women's voices), Foote; "Spring Delight," Cui; Cecilia Society. Songs, "Song of the Shepherd Lehl," "Chant Hindu," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Psyche," Paladilhe; "My Laddie," Thayer; Mme. Gluck. "Hunting Song," Benedict; "Netherland Folksong," arranged by Kremser; Cecilia Society.

The program for the Cecilia concert promises an evening of musical pleasure which excellent part song interpretation and the work of notable solo singers can give. The work by Charles Martin Loeffler to be sung is called one of the most interesting and characteristic pieces of his writing. It is set to words that fancy a hero for whom loving memorial praises are being sung. There is much tenderness in the words and the music is enthusiastically announced by the Cecilians to be the most singable and truly lovely of all the extreme modern work that they have undertaken, thus far. It is an eight-part chorus and the handling of the various voices is masterly for the variety and unexpectedness. One looks for this, of course, in modern composition, but it is here united with a solidity of form which much writing of this school does not achieve. At least this is the impression that obtains among those who have rehearsed it; and, especially in the case of the Cecilia, the dictum of the singers is worth attention.

The Bach choral has been heard before, but it is being worked up under Mr. Mees' direction to a degree of finish which is not often attained. The Verdi music for women's voices is familiar but always pleasing.

Tenor of Metropolitan Opera, Cecilia Soloist, Will Interpret Songs

Copyright by Mishkin Studio, New York

LEO SLEZAK

HERALD,

MARCH 14, 1912.

tained in the report just issued giving the results of the conference held between the sub-committee of the Brookline citizens' committee on appropriation and the school board. The school board's estimates are approved, and an increase of $1700 in the school expenses appropriation is recommended to cover the proposed advance in wages of janitors.

[174]

GLOBE—MARCH 10, 1912

Mr Slezak and Alma Gluck Are Cecilia Soloists

The illness of Madame Eames which compelled her and Mr de Gogorza to cancel their engagement with the Cecilia Society for its second and last concert in Symphony Hall, Thursday evening, March 21, caused a great deal of disappointment to a large number of music lovers of this city. It is fortunate, however, that C. A. Ellis, who has the concert in charge, has been able to find such adequate substitutes as Leo Slezak and Alma Gluck.

The impression that Mme Gluck made on musical connoisseurs when she appeared at the first of this season's Symphony concerts was rather remarkable. She exhibited traits of musicianship and general artistry which are seldom found in so young a singer, and it is fairly certain that this artist will secure as great a vogue here in Boston as she has in New York and other cities where she has appeared more frequently.

Mr Slezak, who has already appeared at the Boston Opera House in opera, gave a song recital in Jordan Hall a few weeks ago which was a revelation. It was said that such enthusiasm as he created has rarely seen here at a voice recital.

The Cecilia has been hard at work making preparations for this concert. Under Dr Mees' skillful direction it has recovered much of its old skill and technique. Its part of the program will be largely a capella music, comprising a motet by Bach, two choruses in eight parts by Cornelius and Loeffler, a chorus for women's voices by Verdi and some part songs.

Mr Bachaus Soloist at Symphony Concerts

Since he has been in Boston Mr Fiedler has made it a rule to play the principal tone poems of Strauss every other year. Almost exactly two years ago he played the Symphonia Domestica, which two years before that had been introduced to Boston by Dr Muck. Mr Fiedler has placed this work on next week's Symphony programs and, as the season is rapidly nearing its close, it is likely that this will be the last important performance of Strauss we will have under his direction.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the eminent German pianist, who is making his first tour of America, will be the soloist. Some weeks ago Mr Bachaus made his debut in Boston in recital and disclosed high qualities of musicianship in his playing. He will play here the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven, with which he has won great praise in New York. The program begins with the "Der Freischutz" overture of Weber, after which will come the concerto and the program will end with the "Domestica."

A Year of Visiting Symphony Orchestras

The "wander lust" has possessed the symphonic bodies this year, tempting some of the Western orchestras into Eastward flights to try the mettle of their conductors and players upon cosmopolitan audiences. The Chicago orchestra has twice journeyed to New York and Boston. The Cincinnati orchestra which, under its brilliant young conductor, Leopold Stokowski, for a season the organist and choirmaster at St Bartholemew's, New York, has included Chicago in its journeys, and has moved certain of the scribes to write fulsome if not altogether discreet praise.

Now the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, Emil Oberhoffer, conductor, is about to try its wings in New York in a concert announced for Monday evening, March 18. The symphony is to be Brahms' first, and for the most serious tax upon virtuosity, Strauss' great epic, "Death and Transfiguration." The tourney with which the Philharmonic of New York began the season to display its new conductor has been followed.

TRAVELER, MARCH 9, 1912.

Weingartner's Symphony Played.

BY FRANK BERTWALL.

The first hearing in this city of a Weingartner Symphony and the presence of Miss Maud Powell as soloist drew an exceptionally good-sized audience to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the 18th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra. The Weingartner selection was the first number on the programme, and perhaps it was well, for it makes demands on the players that could best be met while the players are fresh.

The composition, however, barring the third movement and possibly a few passages in the fourth, is not striking or particularly impressive. It represents labor rather than inspiration or genius. There is a bit of a waltz movement played by the flute, celesta and harp that is kind of pretty but more suggestive of what it might have been than a satisfying demonstration of what has been actually accomplished. All the way through the Symphony there keeps cropping out snatches that would seem to give the impression Mr. Weingartner's ear had been pleased by passages in the works of more famous composers.

There was a noticeable lack of enthusiasm on the part of the audience throughout the number, in fact the only time the applause bordered on the enthusiastic was just before the close of the third movement when Weingartner makes a good deal of the organ in attaining his climax.

Miss Powell seemed to revel in the difficulties of the Sibelius Concerto. It is a composition few violinists seem equal to, yet invites a player of the first calibre. Miss Powell was enthusiastically applauded at the close of each movement and recalled and recalled at its close. The composition does not win the listener, for it's too mournful, so that such interest as it arouses must come from the interpretation of the artist.

Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture provided a rather tame close, after the concerto, not that the composition lacks spirit or that the orchestra missed any opportunities, but rather that it does not seem to have a great deal to tell.

Next week's rehearsal and concert call for Weber's "Der Freischeutz" overture, the Strauss Symphonia [illegible] and Beethoven's Concer[illegible]

CECILIA SOCIETY

The illness of Madam Eames compelled her and Mr. de Gogorza to cancel their engagement with the Cecilia Society for its second and last concert in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, March 21. Mr. C. A. Ellis, who has the concert in charge, has been able to find such adequate substitutes as Leo Slezak and Alma Gluck. The impression that Mme. Gluck made on musical connoisseurs when she appeared at the first of this season's Symphony concerts was remarkable. She exhibited traits of musicianship and general artistry which are seldom found in so young a singer. Mr. Slezak, who has already appeared at the Boston Opera House in opera, gave a song recital in Jordan Hall a few weeks ago and aroused enthusiasm.

The Cecilia has been hard at work making preparations for this concert under Dr. Mees's direction. Its part of the program will be largely a cappella music comprising a motet by Bach, two choruses in eight parts by Cornelius and Loeffler, a chorus for female voices by Verdi and some part songs.

JOURNAL,

MARCH 9, 1912.

MAUD POWELL CHARMS AS OF OLD AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The American Maud Powell, most famous of all the women violinists on the concert stage today, is this week's Symphony soloist. Twenty-five years ago last Monday this gifted Illinoisan made her debut at the Symphony concerts, and, with the exception of Lady Halle, she has been the leading representative of her sex in the violin field ever since. Yesterday marked her first appearance here since 1907, and the impression she made five years ago with the Sibelius concerto was so strong that she chose the same work for her present engagement here.

Miss Powell—who in private life is Mrs. H. Godfrey Turner—said in New York the other day that the Sibelius concerto is one of her favorites; that she was to play it in Boston at the request of "critics and public, both." Sibelius's compositions are indeed sympathetically listened to in Boston, and Miss Powell's art is admirable from both a technical and an interpretative point of view. Yesterday the audience was duly applausive. It was also restive, as most of these matinee audiences are, and a good many persons went out after the first of the three movements included in the concerto.

The novelty on the program this week is Felix Weingartner's new symphony in E Major, which was first heard in Vienna last season and which was recently performed in New York.

The brilliant overture to Smetana's "Sold Bride" is the last number on the current program, which, of course, will be played again tonight.

Wilhelm Bachaus will be the soloist at next week's concerts and he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for piano and orchestra. Strauss's "Domestic Symphony" and Weber's "Der Freischuetz" overture will complete the program.

From EVENING MAIL

Address New York

Date

Max Fiedler took his final farewell as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening, when he left not only general memories, but a specific one of one of the most effective performances of Strauss's "Domestic Symphony" that this work has ever received here. He was the recipient of many recalls and of a really moving tribute of appreciation.

The rest of the programme consisted of the "Siegfried Idyl," the funeral music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" and the prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde."

ENING TELEGRAM,

New York City.

There was an elegiac quality to the last programme of the Boston Symphony at its final concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and fittingly so, since it marked Max Fiedler's last appearance as the conductor of this famous organization.

The funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" and "The Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" brought the concert to a superb climax. The retiring conductor was acclaimed with the utmost enthusiasm, but modestly refrained from making a speech.

EVENING JOURNAL,

From

Address New York City.

Date MA 25 1912

Two Orchestras Close Concert Season; One Conductor Retires

Lo

By IRVING WEIL.

Music, in New York, has her farewells in the Spring, which one somewhat lazily perceives contains a paradox buried within it; it might be interesting to delve into the whys and the wherefores, but this would possibly require some sort of learned disquisition, and one feels no exuberant impulse toward learned disquisitions—in the Spring. Perhaps therein lies some hazy hint of an answer to the whys and wherefores.

Farewells occupied some part of the concerts of Saturday and Sunday. On Saturday afternoon Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his final appearance here, and the kindly and enthusiastic goodby of the first of the Boston pair of concerts Thursday evening was repeated. When we next hear the great oBston band in the Autumn Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, will be at its head.

On Sunday afternoon Walter Damrosch and the men of the New York Symphony Orchestra appeared for the last time this season at the Century Theatre, although they will be heard next week as one of the organizations to take part in the Brahms Festival at Carnegie Hall. The audience was unusually large and at the end of the programme extended to Mr. Damrosch and the band whom he had conducted a hearty tribute of the high pleasure they have afforded during many weeks.

Mr. Fiedler chose to associate our final impressions of him with a performance of Richard Strauss's "Domestic Symphony," which already has to be "unearthed" whenever a conductor chooses to play it. One need not quarrel with Mr. Fiedler because of his predilection for the music of Strauss. He plays it supremely well, and that is the most effective manner of disclosing its qualities and its defects.

A learned disquisition would again be necessary—enthusiasm of comment would be impossible—for the purposes of any exploration of the "Domestic Symphony," and, as aforementioned, one chooses to forego learned disquisition. Suffice it to say that the Strauss baby was spanked in the usual place—in the symphony—and that one felt like adding just one more instrument to the huge Strauss orchestra, perhaps to be applied to the composer, the same added instrument being a pair of barrel staves.

Mr. Fiedler also played the "Freischuetz" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," the funeral music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," and the Prelude and Liebested from "Tristan and Isolde." It was a superb orchestra

HERALD,

MARCH 24, 1912.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The seventh and next but last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Cambridge, will be given on Thursday evening, March 23, in Sanders Theatre, with Heinrich Warnke, principal 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist. The program will comprise the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, Lalo's Concerto for 'cello and orchestra, and Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfigur[illegible]."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master of the orchestra, will be the soloist at the coming Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Mozart's Concerto for violin and orchestra in D-major No. 4. The symphony will be Rachmaninoff's in E-minor No. 2, which had such success when Mr. Fiedler played it a year ago. The symphony comes first on the program, then the concerto and the last number will be Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE PROVIDENCE, R.I.

Address

Date

MAX FIEDLER I FAREWELL CONCERT

Enthusiastic Ovation on Fin Appearance with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the director of the Bos ton Symphony Orchestra, gave the aud ence that attended his farewell appea ance with that organization in Infant Hall last night, a more than ordinari enjoyable evening. The audience, too, wa of very flattering size and paid Mr. Fied ler the compliment of enthusiastic ap plause for each number played. The ger ial director of the orchestra, who is t sever his connection with the notabl body of musicians at close of this season has made himself very popular in thi city as everywhere he has taken the or ganization and it was with genuine re gret that the audience last night contem plated the fact that they would not agai have the opportunity to see him and hea the big orchestra play under his direction. There was evident a disposition on the part of the large number in the hall to make the most of this last opportunity, however, and to show the director the appreciation they felt of his excellent work at the concerts that have been given under his baton during the past four seasons. He was given an ovation when he took his place on the platform and at the close of the final number on the programme there were repeated calls for his reappearance as he left the stage and he was obliged to respond with bows for several minutes.

Mr. Fiedler's final programme was a collection of gems, while the musicians seemed to enter into the spirit of the occasion and to try to do their very best to reflect still greater credit upon the man who has helped them win increased fame under his leadership. Every number was played with even more marked expression and skill than usual and the most delightful impression was left in the mind of every one as a remembrance of the enjoyment that has been afforded to Providence music lovers by Mr. Fiedler during his engagement as director of this favorite musical organization. Beethoven and Wagner were the only composers drawn upon for the orchestral part of the programme, but there was no lack of variety in the concert and the audience was fully satisfied with the selections for the farewell performance under the guidance of the director. The numbers were as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72..Beethoven
Concerto No. 2, F-minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 21.....Chopin
I. Maestoso.
II. Larghetto.
III. Allegro vivace.
A "Faust" Overture.....Wagner
"A Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner

The soloist was Joseph Hofman, the eminent pianist, and he added to the pleasure afforded by the orchestra by his masterly rendering of the three part selection from Chopin. Mr. Hofman is well known to local concert goers for he has played here a number of times and never fails to attract a large number of admirers. His execution of his selections was wonderful in mastery of technique and success in evoking the beauties of the score and the piano. He was given a warm expression of appreciation and admiration at the conclusion of his number, being called back several times to bow his acknowl[illegible]

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 3, 1912

The Unique Casals and America

The wonder grows that no manager ventures to bring Mr. Casals, the violoncellist to America to play with our orchestras and in recitals of his own. By general consent, he excels the other violoncellists of our immediate time and he ranks very high among interpretative musicians in general. Unique among 'cellists also, he attracts audiences in every country in Europe, whether it be his "personality" or his playing that draws them. The other day, for example, he played at Manchester, in England, and the temperate Guardian wrote of him: "To say that the art of Mr. Casals completely disarms criticism is to give a very inadequate impression of the extraordinary fascination of his playing. The wonderful wealth and variety of tone at his command, the bewildering virtuosity and the superb musical sensibility controlling both, combine to take his performances above and beyond all generally accepted standards of comparison. That his style is all-embracing in its mastery was shown no less by the exquisite way in which he charmed into life the tender and languorous 'Abendlied' by Schumann than in his passionate declamation of the opening phrases of the F major Sonata by Brahms, which became transformed into living flames of fire." Distinctions, like the Legion of Honor in France and the medal of the Philharmonic Society in London are beginning to fall to Mr. Casals, to accent further his unique position among 'cellists. It is becoming the custom of the Symphony Orchestra to summon each year some distinguished virtuoso to a series of its concerts. It could do no better service to itself and to the art of music than so to call Mr. Casals.

MONITOR,

APRIL 6, 1912

The Symphony orchestra leaves Boston Sunday afternoon on a special train to begin its second tour of the middle West. It will travel in a train made up of three Pullmans, a diner and a baggage car. The first concert will be given in Memorial hall, Pittsburgh, on Monday evening, with Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, in the solo number. Tuesday evening it will play in Convention hall, Buffalo, Wednesday evening in Grays' armory, Cleveland, Thursday evening in the City Auditorium, Canton, O., Friday evening in Powers theater, Grand Rapids, Saturday evening in Detroit armory, Detroit, and the following Monday evening in the Colonial theater, Pittsfield, Mass. Mr. Schroeder will be the soloist in Detroit, Miss Florence Hinkle, soprano, will be the soloist in Pittsfield. These are the last out-of-town concerts of the year.

HERALD, APRIL 6, 1912.

REHEARSAL IN SYMPHONY HALL

Twenty-First of Season Given—Program Exclusively from Beethoven.

THREE GREAT WORKS PLAYED

Overture "Leonora" No. 3 Followed by Seventh and Fifth Symphonies.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 21st Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Without any obviously impelling cause the program included only compositions by Beethoven.

The overture "Leonora," No. 3, the overture that is much more dramatic than the opera for which it was written, was followed by two symphonies: Nos. 7 and 5. These three compositions are undoubtedly among the greatest works ever written for the orchestra. The symphonies are so great that they should not be heard one after the other. Either one would have stood out more boldly and inspired the more awe, if the other compositions had been in sharp contrast and of a lighter nature. Nor is it well to be over familiar with gigantic works.

The performance of a colossal symphony should be anticipated long before. The greatest pains should be taken in the preparation. The performance should be an event to be remembered with gratitude. There is plenty of every-day music, excellent of its kind, that gives reasonable entertainment, delights the ear, awakens pleasant thoughts, consoles one for the fret and routine of prosaic life and invokes visions of grace and beauty. It is not good for man to live in close companionship with a genius or to dwell on a mountain peak.

The rhapsodists have had their say; the commentators have pried and conjectured; these three compositions are still sublime in their grandeur. They well nigh express the inexpressible.

Nor have the legends, fondly believed for years, done injury to the music. It matters not whether the characterization of the first theme of the Fifth symphony—"So knocks Fate on the door!" attributed to Beethoven—was invented by Ries, or the rhythms of the theme were suggested by the note of oriole or goldfinch heard by the composer while he walked abroad. It matters not whether the Seventh symphony be a description of Germany exulting in its deliverance from the French yoke, or the apotheosis of the dance; whether the allegretto picture a procession in the catacombs or be the love dream of an odalisque. Whenever the music is played; whenever it comes into the mind, it awakens new thoughts and each one dreams his own dreams.

M. Vincent d'Indy in his life of Beethoven, a book of only 150 pages but a golden book, finds that the Seventh is in reality a pastoral symphony. To him the rhythm of the first theme is not that of a dance tune but one that might have come from a bird; the trio of the scherzo is a pilgrim's song and the finale has the reckless gayety and the tumult of a village festival. And so each one in turn publishes in print or by word of mouth his little explanation, but Beethoven broods, mysterious, gigantic, above the commentators, above even conductors when they misunderstand him, or plume themselves upon a new and striking interpretation, or in their endeavor to grasp and convey to others the essential greatness of the composer put their trust in din and speed.

The audience yesterday enjoyed the program and the performance; it applauded conductor and orchestra most heartily. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will be on a special western trip. The program for the concerts of April 19 and 20 will be announced later. Mr. Noack, violinist, will be the soloist.

TRAVELER,

APRIL 6, 1912.

SYMPHONY ON TOUR.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves Boston again tomorrow afternoon on a special train to begin its second tour of the Middle West. It will travel in a train made up of three Pullmans, a diner and a baggage car. The first concert will be given in Memorial Hall, Pittsburg, Monday evening, with Alwin Schroeder as soloist. Tuesday evening it will play in Convention Hall, Buffalo; Wednesday evening in Gray's Armory, Cleveland; Thursday evening in the City Auditorium, Canton, O.; Friday evening in Powers Treatre, Grand Rapids; Saturday evening in Detroit Armory, Detroit, and the following Monday evening in the Colonial Theatre, Pittsfield, Mass. Mr. Schroeder will also be the soloist in Detroit. Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist in Pittsfield. These are the last out-of-town concerts of the year.

[175]

TIGHT BINDING

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 5, 1912

Our Concerts and Their Public

The Signs and Morals of a Remarkable Season

IT is almost time to compile the record—for those who have a mind to statistics—and to collate the impressions—which are much more interesting—of as remarkable a concert season as Boston has recently known. The Symphony Concerts, prolonged beyond any similar series in America by the visits of the orchestra to other cities, have still a month to run. The concert that is to restore Mr. Nikisch to a public that first knew him twenty years ago and to disclose the quality of the London Symphony Orchestra befalls next Tuesday. A few days later Mr. de Pachmann, the pianist, will take final leave of as faithful a following as he has in any city and gratify at last his ambition to play in Symphony Hall. In his earlier days in America the Symphony Orchestra summoned him occasionally as a "soloist." Then the powers that be in it resented his tricks of manner and antics of speech and would have no more of them. Since the Symphony Orchestra entered into Symphony Hall Mr. de Pachmann has not played with it, and Jordan Hall has been the fit auditorium for the series of recitals that he has undertaken here at each recurring visit. Yet his ambition to sit with his piano on the stage of Symphony Hall has not abated. Once and once only in what seems likely to be his last concert in America he will have the satisfaction that he has sought so long.

Otherwise, the season of concerts is done, and from beginning to end, it has been a remarkable season. Nearly every eminent singer, who has gone up and down the country in song recitals or who has so diversified work in the opera houses, has appeared in Boston. Of the distinguished pianists and violinists who have spent the season on this side of the Atlantic, we have missed hardly one. When the London Symphony Orchestra has come and gone, we shall have had three concerts—an unusual number—by visiting orchestras and their conductors; while for the first time within recollection a noted choral society—the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto—has paid us a visit. Hitherto such orchestral concerts have been counted a hazardous venture in Boston, and in some seasons when our public seemed indifferent to recitals, we have missed one or another "international" virtuoso or singer. In the current musical year, we have heard all these visitors, and we have heard, besides, the ablest and the more interesting of the resident players and singers. As a whole, too, the programmes of the year have been unusually interesting, uncommonly free from merely hackneyed pieces.

When the Opera House was first opened and began to absorb interest in music and expenditure upon it, the groundless fear was that it might unduly diminish the public for concerts. Perhaps its engrossing existence has tended to snuff out what the managers call "local affairs"—that is, the recitals of inconsequential players and singers to "friendly audiences"; but it has in no way harmed the major concerts. It is long since they have flourished in Boston as they have this year. Even on Saturday afternoons "against" a matinée at the Opera House, with eminent singers in the cast, they have not lacked audiences. Instead of dulling interest in concerts, established opera in Boston seems rather to have stimulated it. We have needed less than three years to discover that here, as in all the larger cities of Europe, opera and concerts flourish naturally and readily side by side. The "local affair" is happily diminishing. If it is to make any appeal to general or critical attention, the programme must have some sort of novel interest and the concert-giver some attributes other than ambition and friends. It is a part of the change of Boston from a New England city into a more cosmopolitan capital that such concerts should diminish and fall out of public heed.

By the same token, the eminent or the interesting singers and virtuosi, almost without exception, have paid their visits to Boston, have often paid more than one, and have usually found sufficient or encouraging audiences. In a time easily remembered, listeners at many concerts here were so few that the managers were said to send their singers, pianists and violinists to Boston for the sake of the appreciative articles the newspapers might print about them. For these reviews, as the managers believed, had their fruitful influence elsewhere. This season, the visitors have not lacked audiences. Some of them, like Mr. de Pachmann, have returned to established and expectant publics. Others, like Mr. Bauer and Mr. Hofmann, have won more hearers than ever before. Others still, like Mr. Slezak, have agreeably discovered that a public awaited them. A few concerts, like those of the Mendelssohn Choir and of the Chicago Orchestra have set the interested part of the town talking for days about them. Thus, for one season at least, what a German might call our "concert-life" has been unusually broad, full and stimulating.

Two or three causes for this happy change seem not far to seek. It is true that singers and virtuosi of interest and distinction have sometimes lacked the audiences in Boston that they deserved, or have gained them only after long struggle. It is true also that mediocrity and dulness have found listeners here altogether beyond their deserts. Now the mere increase in the number of concerts has tended to readjust these conditions. Even the habitual concert-goer must now choose among the many proffered to his interest and his purse. In this eliminating process and in the long run, most of the concert-givers tend to find their just level. The dull and the undeserving gradually lose their audiences; the interesting and the striking gain and hold them. Under the present revival of our concert-life, the managers have also gained now courage and new wisdom. More and more they are ceasing to bring mediocrities to Boston, to concentrate their efforts upon singers, violinists and pianists of established rank, and to dare large, brave and exacting ventures like the bringing of the Mendelssohn Choir. They have learned that it is for their advantage, also, to keep the concerts of this town pitched high and as animated and varied as may be. Most important of all they have discovered that Boston is large enough now to yield diverse publics for diverse concerts, and to develop a new public to replace one that is gradually disappearing from our concert-halls.

It used to be the custom to speak of the concert-going public as a unit. Maybe it was in the days when Boston was a relatively small, self-centred and self-sufficient city. Nowadays the public that fills Symphony Hall, on a Sunday afternoon, to hear Mr. Bonci sing and Mr. Kubelik play is very different from the public of the socially and the musically elect that sits before Mr. Clément and his French pieces, for example, in Jordan Hall. The wandering prime donne usually find an eager audience in Boston—and the suburbs—for their song recitals; but Mr. Bauer and Mr. Hofmann for pianists who give their hearers no such easy pleasure, have also found that they do not lack sufficient and absorbed listeners. As Mr. de Pachmann has often proved, a virtuoso once established here, can count upon many "return visits" to assured audiences. Not so long ago, musical curiosity over newcomers seemed to run low in Boston. This season it has perceptibly revived. An audience filled Symphony Hall for the Mendelssohn Choir. Mr. Slezak and Miss Teyte, for example, did not sing to a relatively empty Jordan Hall.

TIMES, PAWTUCKET.

APRIL 3, 1912.

CLOSING CONCERT BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Conductor Fiedler's Farewell Throngs Infantry Hall—Joseph Hofmann, Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied by Joseph Hofmann, visited providence last evening for the final concert of the season. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven; Concerto No. 2, F-minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 21, Chopin; A "Faust" Overture, Wagner; "A Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

It was a double farewell, the season's closing concert by this noted musical organization, and the last Providence concert to be played under the magnetic leadership of the present conductor, Max Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler is now bringing his engagement with the Boston orchestra to a close and will return to Germany. His successor will be Karl Muck, who was also Mr. Fiedler's predecessor, and is the only leader ever re-engaged in the 30 years of the orchestra's history.

Last evening's concert was a fitting climax to the seasons of brilliant work which have placed Mr. Fiedler's fame at the highest point of modern musical achievement. The programme contained no "new" work. There was no attempt to make the farewell artificially noteworthy by the introduction of features not to be found in the ordinary symphony concert. Indeed, it might be said that Mr. Fiedler had taken pains to guard against anything of this kind. Some of the brilliant novelties which have been played under his leadership here several times in the past four years would have added materially to the cleverness of the programme—as a programme, but it is almost inconceivable that any choice of selections could possibly be hailed with greater enthusiasm by players or audience.

Mr. Hofmann's gifts as a piano virtuoso are now too well known to need particular praise. His interpretation of Chopin's F-minor concerto, his rendition of the rippling melodies of the work, were no less than exquisite at times and were always thoroughly satisfying. It is a pleasure to hear him, and he will always be welcomed here. It is also needless to dwell particularly on the work of the orchestra. Throughout the evening the performers played like men inspired, reaching the climax in the majectic passages of the Tannhauser overture. It will be long before the members of that great audience, which filled Infantry Hall to the doors on a dripping night, will forget the dramatic finish of that stirring final number.

At the close the audience waited for more than a full minute, in the hope that the orchestra might possibly repeat a part of the final number, something which is entirely contrary to the etiquette of symphony concerts. There was no departure from the custom in this instance, although the evident enthusiasm of conductor and players, as well as the audience, led to the belief that an exception might be made.

ADVERTISER, MARCH 30, 1912

MISS BESSIE COLLIER SYMPHONY SOLOIST

BOSTON ARTIST WINS FLATTERING SUCCESS

Was Suddenly Called on to Fill Place of Sylvain Noack, Who Was Indisposed.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Rachmaninoff—Symphony in E minor. No. 2.
Bruch—Violin concerto in G minor. No. 1.
Soloist, Miss Bessie Collier.
Mendelssohn—"Midsummernight's Dream" Overture.

Sylvain Noack, our excellent violinist, had been announced for this concert, but the fates willed it otherwise. A siege of neuralgia with the addition of a sudden fall and a resulting sprained wrist, placed that artist "hors de combat." But there are always eminent artists to draw upon in Boston. Miss Bessie Collier was to have appeared with the orchestra in the concerts of April 19th and 20th, and an emergency call brought her to the platform three weeks earlier than had been planned. Instead of a Mozart concerto, which Mr. Noack would have played, we had the romantic G minor concerto by Max Bruch, one of the very few great concertos for the violin. It is astonishing how much stronger this work is than the second and third violin concertos by the same composer. Miss Collier gave the first movement, with its improvisational character, in a commendably clear and elastic fashion. When one compares this style of freedom with the solo display that was given in the Sibelius concerto recently one realizes how poetic and superior this movement is. But the slow movement which follows is to us the gem of the work. Its sentiment was most charmingly caught by the young violinist. The ensemble was perfect, the orchestra balancing the soloist and neither trying to force the other. The perfect intonation, the clear double-stopping in the first and last movements, the surety in high positions were matters to grow enthusiastic over. The artist's tone was delicate and sweet rather than broad.

As the sudden change of programme prevented the programme-book from giving an account of Miss Collier's career, this biographical notice may be pertinent:—

"Bessie Bell Collier, born at Cohasset, Mass., April 3, 1885. Began the study of the violin at the age of four under the instruction of Mrs. Charles W. Gammons, a pupil of Carl Kneisel, of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"At the age of five played in concert. Went under the instruction of Franz Kneisel, concert-master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at the age of eight. Continued under his instruction 10 years, studying between lessons with Messrs. Svencenski and Willie Kraft, of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"Dec. 19, 1904, made her debut at a concert in Steinert hall. Nov. 7, 1905, played with the New Haven Symphony orchestra at New Haven, the Raff concerto for the violin.

"Played with the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Franz Kneisel, at the Worcester Festival, October, 1906, her selection being Saint-Saens' Rondo Capriccioso.

"Nov. 12, 1910, played the Bruch G-minor concerto with the New York Symphony, at Brooklyn, and Nov. 17, the same concerto with the Boston Symphony, at Cambridge.

"Feb. 23, 1912, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Brooklyn, N. Y., the Saint-Saens B-minor concerto.

"She took a western trip in 1908, and has played extensively throughout New England and the middle states."

We have already intimated that something more of breadth is needed by the artist. When this is attained she will rank with any female violinist of the present. As it is she is an excellent concert performer and the great enthusiasm which greeted her clean-cut, unaffected work was fully deserved. She was recalled again and again at the end of the concerto, and won a complete success.

The Rachmaninoff symphony was reviewed in these columns about a year ago—in October and in November, 1910. The Russian composer has no cause to complain of cold treatment on the part of Mr. Fiedler, for this symphony was repeated within a month of its first Boston hearing, and now we have had it again. We confess that the work gains by repeated hearing, but there are many others that might improve on closer acquaintance, yet such opportunities are denied them.

The work is, of course, for the largest of orchestras, since no modern except Wolf-Ferrari and Debussy cares to retail his orchestral ideas; it must be wholesale or nothing. But Rachmaninoff does not follow the modern school into the bog of formlessness. There is a continuity of idea running through the work, which is partly attained by transference of thematic material from movement to movement, the finale being especially rich in reminiscence.

Although the work is not formless, it is not as melodic as some other Rachmaninoff's compositions. It is not as impressive as the "Isle of the Dead." Nevertheless it shudders and shivers, and roars and sighs, and whispers and explodes, much as many other modern "mood-pictures" do. It seems to be "programme-music" with the programme left out—a fault that we have sometimes found with Mahler's symphonies.

There is no real scherzo in the piece, although the movement which took its place was bizarre enough. It had a fugue of quassia bitterness, a mixture of counterpoint and vinegar. The adagio pleased us, although there is much to admire in the finale also. But at the end one desires to know what all the pianissimo mysteries and whisperings are about. In largeness of plan, broad architecture and impressive presentation of string contrasts, the first movement leaves the most lasting impression. It is really a noble movement, and the climax of the finale was overwhelming.

The performance was one that aroused the audience. Mr. Fiedler is very much at home in just this school of music and rides on the waves of its difficulties with no more symptoms of being swamped than a cork would be. He is doing wisely in showing his power in this field in these last concerts, for he will leave an impression in Boston that will be indelible. He was recalled with great enthusiasm at the end of the symphony and the orchestra was also compelled to rise.

MONITOR, MARCH 30, 1912

MUSIC

MISS COLLIER SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, rehearsed its twentieth program on Friday afternoon, with Miss Bessie Bell Collier, the Boston violinist, substituting for Sylvain Noack in the solo number. Mr. Noack was to have played a Mozart concerto. Miss Collier played the G minor concerto of Bruch. The program was as follows: Rachmaninoff, symphony in E minor, No. 2, op. 27; Bruch, concerto for violin and orchestra, in G minor, No. 1, op. 26; Mendelssohn, overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 21.

The matinee audience has not in a long time shown such pleasure in the leading number of the program as it showed in the Rachmaninoff symphony. It has often enough recalled Mr. Fiedler the polite three times which are the signal for the men of the orchestra to stand up and be appreciated; but it has seldom done the thing with the enthusiasm and the unmistakable let-go of Friday. The E minor symphony seems to have won a place in the repertory of the Boston organization comparable with that held by the symphonic poems of Richard Strauss. The corridor talk at the intermission was never more unanimously hopeful of the cause of modern music. Acute student met practised listener, and each had his proof ready as to which was the best of the four movements. The student liked the way the laughter rang out in the second movement.

"Too long drawn out, though," said the practised listener. "The last movement is the best, with its masterly summing up of the thought of the whole work. You know from this movement that the work is a real symphony. In the end your whole hour of listening is rewarded, justified, related to the rest of your musical experience."

"More closely related than it ought to be in certain spots in that last allegro," put in the student; "unless Rachmaninoff intended his most prominent theme, the one that sings so smoothly, to have quotation marks around it."

This work called out expressions of praise in this column at the time of its first Boston production in the fall of 1910. Reviewers can not always stand by their comment on a new work a year and a half after making it. But what was originally said about this one may be repeated. It ran in part as follows:

"Does not Rachmaninoff in his Second symphony succeed better than anybody else in making the orchestra of today, with its peculiar character of virtuosity and tone ensemble, express just what we all feel? Other composers, German, French, Austrian, Russian, and that none may be omitted, Finnish and American, have contributed to the stock of ideas; and now comes Rachmaninoff selecting what is worthiest in it all and giving us an inclusive, satisfactory picture. If you want a general impression of the musical age of which you are a part, if you want to know all the best that the symphony as an art form has had to say for itself since Brahms and Tschaikowsky, go and hear Rachmaninoff's Second symphony."

Miss Collier, the soloist, had complete success with the Bruch concerto. If she had known long ago that she was to appear with the orchestra this week, she would have doubtless have mastered all the difficult double-stopping, so that there would not have been the slightest trace of indistinct phrasing. For she is a remarkably accomplished executant. Her tone, too, is pleasing, being rich, varied and in temperamental agreement with whatever passage she is reading. Miss Collier played the concerto in a way to throw light on the methods of the composer. Bruch is skilful as no other writer in the concerto form is in making the orchestra reinforce the individuality of the solo instrument. He does not treat the concerto symphonically; at any rate he does not in the of his series of violin concerto makes the solo instrument more than even the old masters do. rather obvious in his methods, es he likes to have a highly colored in the orchestra duplicate the line solo melody in a lower part scale. But he is always ingr and he never overdoes any of his If we can accept his method, give him the praise of being in his field.

[176]

EVENING STAR
From Baltimore, Md.
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS LOCAL SEASON

Homer Sang Well, But the Orchestral Work Was Disappointing.

Partially obscured by haze, the sun of Baltimore's season of music set last evening with the final local concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric, plunging us into a six-month night, to be unrelieved by an aurora. True, there is forecasted a phenomenal afterglow when Arthur Nikisch and the London Symphony Orchestra shall visit here. Musicians are already busy preparing to observe this wonder. When the next bi-yearly sun arises its rays are expected to be intensified by Dr. Karl Muck, who was with the Boston organization before Fiedler. Last night's concert brought the opportunity to hear Louise Homer sing, and the privilege of bidding "good-by" to Herr Max Fiedler. Having presided over the Boston Symphony Orchestra for several years, he is soon to depart for other shores.

Mme. Homer eschewed all works of a coloratura nature and chose instead the familiar and beautiful Loreley, by Liszt, and a work of even more modern stamp, the recitative and aria of Lia, from Debussy's L'Enfant Prodigue. These gave much unbroken melody to the audience. None will question the beauty of Mme. Homer's voice, even though she does augment and diminish intervals by quarter-tones. Range, power and quality she showed to advantage, and the high notes were telling, although never taken loudly at any time. Some of these are unusual features, for which all should be truly thankful. The development of the singing voice into magnitude is a world's wonder, the extent of which is often overlooked. It is not surprising that the possessor of such an ideal accomplishment is extravagantly lauded. Beside such the voices of others become insignificant.

Comparisons have been forced upon Baltimoreans this season since the advent of a rival orchestra. Circumstances used to cause the local element to regard the Boston organization with almost awe and as an impregnable stronghold of symphonic supremacy. There was much to substantiate the attitude, and far be it from anyone to discount the debt all owe it. The pains those took to bring it here have been rewarded, and no influx of competition can diminish the fruits it will continue to bear. But another element arose, packed its duds and came to Baltimore town. Now, lo! our Dagon has fallen the third time, and, if biblical history repeats itself, is beyond repair. We are aghast! Can it be true? Well, time, as always, will decide, and, after all, it is only the supremacy that seems lost.

If the truth be told, it must be said the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night made an aged and shabby appearance. What is the matter with it? Where is the spontaneity, the virility? There were times during the evening when it seemed the orchestra had stepped out of its racing class into the shoes of an old plug rejuvenated for an auction sale. Director Fiedler, reins in hand, vigorously applied the whip, while many hearts encouraged him, crying: "Go it, old man! You've got the right idea!" But, nevertheless, it ambled unconcernedly through its paces, decidedly off its mettle. Everything suffered to some extent, was often prosaic when it should have been poetic, and consequently no real enthusiasm was shown by the audience at any time during the concert. Instead of leaving the concert hall jubilant, the audience merely "went home," and for the most part without politely stopping to say "good-by" to Director Fiedler. There is not going to be any time and space used here to thresh out the whys and wherefores of the matter; but it was certainly disappointing not to have some compensation for being fed with the same Leonore overture of Beethoven's and the same Brahms symphony that another orchestra gave to our complete satisfaction two months ago, and the same Wagner prelude to Lohengrin (Ach! Himmel!) and Richard Strauss' Death and Transfiguration tone poem that has been lately heard. Some of these things are occasionally enjoyable, and there is no objection now to the said Strauss' work. Brahms' first symphony is more than welcome. But! Can't we ever have anything else? Is it any more difficult to play one piece in one city than another? For heaven's sake, shelve some of these compositions for awhile, or else do more than bring them out with a semblance of being brushed up into respectability!

Mr. Fiedler evidently understands the Brahms symphony, but the orchestra failed to interpret it. It had just such a humdrum reading as to block Brahms' proper recognition and unjustly label him as tiresome. Instead of that, there is a growing belief that his music is the music of the spheres and that many of the other harmonies we dub as "soulful" are effervescences that will rise in bubbles to the surface of time's stream and disappear. The symphony should have been crystalline; it was murky, and the third movement devoid of all point and delicacy. There was no appreciation of proportions, nor possibilities of voice-leadings. The result was like a poorly stencilled seal—indistinct, with not even the general outlines completely showing. Brahms has a good deal to say and says it well. This must be duly considered when his works are presented.

Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin is a scratchy abomination in the high-pitched string parts, more often than not. These set the teeth on edge last night.

Numerous examples during the course of the concert showed that composers are misusing the tympani. There are really many situations that do not require the use of these drums. A little thought

---

...ought to re... to... Certainly, the use of instruments of percussion should be governed by musical and not program reasons.

Collectively, Baltimore was rude to Mr. Fiedler last night. Responsibility of concert-goers does not end with vouchsafing the regal presence of their august selves. It takes a mountain of marvels to move some of them to warmth; and, forgetting all the good that the retiring director has done, just because he did not heat them white hot with his work last night, they coldly got up out of their seats at the close and departed. All this speaks so well for the boasted manners and Southern hospitality of the city! It is well to learn little details of conduct in life; but none can afford to fawn over them, thus making them artificialities. How wonderful the world would be, if, with Shakespeare, we said to ourselves, and meant, "This, above all: to thine own self be true; and it must follow as the night the day, thou canst not, then, be false to any man."

J. N. H.

POST,
APRIL 6, 1912

BEETHOVEN ENTHRALLS VAST CROWD

Remarkable Demonstration of Delight at Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

For the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Fiedler took his courage in hand and gave a concert of Beethoven music: the third Leonore overture, the seventh and fifth symphony. The placing of two great symphonies by one composer on a single programme has not occurred in many years, if at all, in the history of the orchestra. In these days the attempt is a courageous one, and yesterday afternoon it succeeded amazingly well.

STAY AND APPLAUD

After each of the performances Mr. Fiedler was repeatedly recalled, and twice in the course of the concert the orchestra rose to its feet with him. Finally, at the end, an audience which usually grasps hat and gloves before the final chord and flies for the exits remained for fully five minutes applauding for all it was worth. The concert was felt to be in the nature of one of the farewell ceremonies, for the programme was so much after Mr. Fiedler's heart, and the music was interpreted with such characteristic enthusiasm and devotion.

Nearly all of the music sounded magnificently. This was first of all on account of the undying sincerity of music which, in contradistinction to the efforts of thousands of music-makers, was written through sheer necessity of expression, through a profound inner need—and secondly, the sincerity of the interpreter. Perhaps in these days our ears naturally and inevitably crave more contrast of color than is furnished in the course of an all-Beethoven programme by, say, the unobtrusive key-sequences of the seventh symphony, but, as a whole, the concert gave an astonishing amount of pleasure. Again, it should be emphasized, largely on account of the feeling for every note on the part of the conductor. Conductors find it necessary, in these days, to devote infinite pains to the preparation of a work by Strauss and Debussy, and by consequence the Beethoven symphonies and other works suffer, because they are so well-known and so likely to be accepted by any but genuine and full-hearted musicians as a feature of routine.

Brilliant and Dramatic

The performance of the overture was a brilliant and dramatic one, although each detail, too, was carefully observed and always perceptible in its correct proportions. The music is invincibly thrilling, as it was a couple of generations ago, as it will be for generations to come. For the farther the search the greater need for Beethoven's incomparable greatness of soul, for his all-embracing humanity. Art is not entirely a matter of style, and sincerity is still of some slight value to the artist and the public.

Moreover, this marvellously clear, clean, glowing, healthy instrumentation, and the elemental force of the music are still novel. Still, however, the music is adequately played; it moves one to the marrow. It is still marvellous to feel the sweep, the overwhelming might of the overture. The puissant swing of the introductory theme of the 7th symphony, in the wind instruments, as the strings dance rapturously up a Jacob's ladder of tone is an Olympic thing.

Finally, all were thrilled by what is deservedly and creditably to the public the most popular of symphonies, the symphony in C minor—by the opening that remains more titanic than anything accomplished lately, by the force which, one would imagine, would have cloven in twain the man who dared to handle it. To feel this consuming and replenishing energy, and the majesty of its expression, the superb arrangement of every phrase, every beam and arch of the structure, is one of the most intoxicating experiences that can befall the modern music

ADVERTISER, APRIL 6, 1912

SYMPHONY CONCERT ENTIRELY BEETHOVEN

CONTAINED NOTHING BUT ORCHESTRAL NUMBERS

Proof Anew How Infinitely More Versatile Beethoven Was Than Latter Day Composers.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. "Leonora, No. 3," overture.
Beethoven. Symphony in A major, No. 7.
Beethoven. Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

Not since the symphony concerts were started, more than a generation ago, has there been a programme of this character presented. Two large symphonies by the same composer, and a good-sized overture thrown in as "Lagniappe." Wagner programmes we have often had, but such a classical Beethoven programme never. Two symphonies! It is only a step from this to the Bulow idea of playing a symphony twice over, in the same concert, so that the laity may have a chance to study it. The laity are seldom grateful for such chances, since they do not generally take concerts in such a pedagogical manner, but this was a notable exception.

This concert was by no means as severe or taxing as many a previous one in which three or four modern composers have vied with each other in new progressions, heavy scoring or enigmatical meanings. It was a supreme test of Beethoven and it showed that no amount of modernity can dim his power or make him seem old-fashioned. It was a fine proof of the fact that our sheet anchor still holds and that we are not drifting aimlessly, to see the attention given to the works and the hearty applause following them.

Yet we would have preferred to have heard our well-beloved conductor in a Strauss or Wagner programme, where he seems so pre-eminent, rather than in a set of Beethoven works in which we have had many great readings. Nikisch, Muck, Gericke, Paur, have all done great things with this or that Beethoven symphony.

Such a programme proved how infinitely more versatile Beethoven was than the latter-day composers. There was not only no monotony in the concert, but there was excellent contrast. The "Leonora" overture, best of the dramatic school, was finely effective with its touches of sorrow, suspense, its trumpet calls, and its final delirium of triumph. When Beethoven was exultant his joy became a wild frenzy, as witness the end of this overture, or the end of the opera which follows it.

Against this there was the rather rustic dance vein of the first movement of the seventh symphony, which was finely caught up. And after this came the gem of the concert, the slow movement of this work, almost a threnody, yet having divine consolation in its second part—the essence of consolation and hope. And Mr. Fiedler did not dawdle the tempo of this "Allegretto," but gave it rather as pensive brooding than as a funeral march.

The scherzo of this symphony, with its unnecessary repetitions, is scarcely as strong as the first two movements, but the brilliant finale was exciting enough although taken a little too quick. Beethoven prized this work as the best of his symphonies, and with the exception noted it is certainly as strong as any of the nine.

The fifth symphony is the favorite warhorse of all conductors, but we question whether their enthusiasm is shared by all auditors. Of course there is a good deal to be made out of the "fate knocking at the door" figure, and of the struggle between the chief and subordinate themes, in the first movement, but if any auditors imagine that Beethoven had any idea of "Fate" when this four-noted figure came into his mind, let them examine the first sketch of the work as preserved to us by Nottebohm, and they will see that he thought of it only as a rather rollicking and chattering subject. The clearness with which all this ingenious figure-treatment was brought out wins admiration for both conductor and orchestra.

The strings were on dress parade in the variations of the slow movement and the bassoon at the end (in the coda) also deserves mention. But of course the contrabasses shone preeminent in the scherzo that followed. It is to be noticed that Beethoven made the contrabass part especially prominent and especially difficult in this symphony, possibly as a defiant answer to Von Weber who had satirized his difficult contrabass passages of the fourth symphony mercilessly. At any rate, these passages, which were once deemed almost impossible (as were the high violin passages in the "Egmont" overture) were by no means so to our great orchestra, and they were played with clearness and power.

The finale was again the triumphant Beethoven. It has been well said that this finale (the first use of the heroic trombones in sympathy is here) would have been the fittest ending to the "Eroica" symphony.

From all of the above it may be seen that the contrasts of the programme were as wide and vivid as the instrumental character of the scores could possibly give. It showed the sorrows, the joys, the playfulness, the romance, the intellectuality, and the tone-coloring of the Genius. It made it clear to the layman why it is that when we think of great composers we generally put Beethoven in the first place. Bach was greater in intellectuality, Schumann in pure romance, Chopin in emotional power, but no one presented intellect and emotion with such equipoise as Beethoven. Therefore it was well, for once, to have this object-lesson, to allow this innovation in the make-up of a symphony programme.

That the public enjoyed it was very evident. The applause was of the heartiest and was given after each work. We wonder if such marked applause after classical works is not also a remonstrance against the modern symphonic distortions.

One thing is certain! The public is showing it prizes Mr. Fiedler. "Blessings brighten as they take their flight." Whenever our conductor comes upon the stage he is welcomed with remarkable enthusiasm, and yesterday afternoon, at the end of the concert, instead of pinning on hats and rushing for trolleys, the public stayed to recall the conductor three times. The tribute was very pointed, for the applause went on after he had caused the orchestra to rise in response. No conductor has become a greater favorite in Boston than Mr. Max Fiedler.

HERALD,
MARCH 30, 1912.

SYMPHONY BY RACHMANINOFF

Mr. Fiedler and Orchestra Warmly Greeted on Return from New York.

INTERPRETATION VIGOROUS

Mr. Noack Unable to Appear Because of Injury Due to Fall.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rachmaninoff, Symphony in E minor, No. 2; Bruch, concerto in G minor, No. 1, for violin and orchestra; Mendelssohn, overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

It had been announced that Mr. Noack would play a violin concerto by Mozart; but he fell and injured his wrist so that his appearance as a soloist was necessarily deferred. Miss Collier took his place at short notice. She expected to play later in the season. There were agreeable features in her performance of the first and second movements of Bruch's concerto; but however estimable her talent may be, she has not yet fully attained to the artistic stature which should entitle her to play at these concerts. Yesterday she was applauded liberally.

Mr. Fiedler was warmly greeted on his return from the last trip of the orchestra to New York and other cities, and his reading of the symphony evidently gave great pleasure to the audience, yet this symphony has been played here with more marked technical brilliance and with greater regard to nuances of expression. Yesterday the performance was steadily vigorous; one might even use the word muscular. Yet in its way this reading was effective by dint of sonorousness.

The symphony was played twice last season. It was immediately enjoyed by many; some praised it extravagantly, and one or two, I believe, described it as "epoch-making." The music does not wear well; its diffuseness is more and more apparent, and in a symphony that lasts nearly an hour, there is really little musical thought that is taken away by the hearer. The broad and sweeping themes are often Tschaikowskian in profile and in harmonic and orchestral dress, and there are instances of Tschaikowskian detail. It is natural that Rachmaninoff should be influenced in a measure by his predecessor, but it is also natural to expect from the composer of "The Island of the Dead" a stronger revelation of individuality.

It is easy to see why this work stirs an audience, especially when it is performed in a flamboyant manner: there are obvious melodies, and I am not denying the effectiveness of some of them; there is pomp and there is glitter; there are climaxes—too many of them; there is decorative music galore.

Would that Mendelssohn had written always in the spirit of the overture played yesterday and in that of "Fingal's Cave"! Would that he had not fallen into the evil ways of formalism and sentimentalism and wallowed there!

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Beethoven's overture "Leonora," No. 3; symphony in A major, No. 7; symphony in C minor, No.

From WORLD BROOKLYN EDIT
Address New York
Date MAR 24 19

The twenty-fifth consecutive season of concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to an end with the fifth and last concert of the present series given in the Academy of Music last Friday evening. Incidentally this concert marked the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for his engagement with the orchestra ends at the close of the present season in May, when he will return to Germany. Next season and for a term of years to follow the orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded four years ago. The soloist was Mme. Louise Homer, the popular contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House.

[177]

EVENING STAR

From ... Baltimore, Md.

Address ...

Date ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS LOCAL SEASON

Homer Sang Well, But the Orchestral Work Was Disappointing.

Partially obscured by haze, the sun of Baltimore's season of music set last evening with the final local concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric, plunging us into a six-month night, to be unrelieved by an aurora. True, there is forecasted a phenomenal afterglow when Arthur Nikisch and the London Symphony Orchestra shall visit here. Musicians are already busy preparing to observe this wonder. When the next bi-yearly sun arises its rays are expected to be intensified by Dr. Karl Muck, who was with the Boston organization before Fiedler. Last night's concert brought the opportunity to hear Louise Homer sing, and the privilege of bidding "good-by" to Herr Max Fiedler. Having presided over the Boston Symphony Orchestra for several years, he is soon to depart for other shores.

Mme. Homer eschewed all works of a coloratura nature and chose instead the familiar and beautiful Loreley, by Liszt, and a work of even more modern stamp, the recitative and aria of Lia, from Debussy's L'Enfant Prodigue. These gave much unbroken melody to the audience. None will question the beauty of Mme. Homer's voice, even though she does augment and diminish intervals by quarter-tones. Range, power and quality she showed to advantage, and the high notes were telling, although never taken loudly at any time. Some of these are unusual features, for which all should be truly thankful. The development of the singing voice into magnitude is a world's wonder, the extent of which is often overlooked. It is not surprising that the possessor of such an ideal accomplishment is extravagantly lauded. Beside such the voices of others become insignificant.

Comparisons have been forced upon Baltimoreans this season since the advent of a rival orchestra. Circumstances used to cause the local element to regard the Boston organization with almost awe and as an impregnable stronghold of symphonic supremacy. There was much to substantiate the attitude, and far be it from anyone to discount the debt all owe it. The pains those took to bring it here have been rewarded, and no influx of competition can diminish the fruits it will continue to bear. But another element arose, packed its duds and came to Baltimore town. Now, lo! our Dagon has fallen the third time, and, if biblical history repeats itself, is beyond repair. We are aghast! Can it be true? Well, time, as always, will decide, and, after all, it is only the supremacy that seems lost.

If the truth be told, it must be said the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night made an aged and shabby appearance. What is the matter with it? Where is the spontaneity, the virility? There were times during the evening when it seemed the orchestra had stepped out of its racing class into the shoes of an old plug rejuvenated for an auction sale. Director Fiedler, reins in hand, vigorously applied the whip, while many hearts encouraged him, crying: "Go it, old man! You've got the right idea!" But, nevertheless, it ambled unconcernedly through its paces, decidedly off its mettle. Everything suffered to some extent, was often prosaic when it should have been poetic, and consequently no real enthusiasm was shown by the audience at any time during the concert. Instead of leaving the concert hall jubilant, the audience merely "went home," and for the most part without politely stopping to say "good-by" to Director Fiedler. There is not going to be any time and space used here to thresh out the whys and wherefores of the matter; but it was certainly disappointing not to have some compensation for being fed with the same Leonore overture of Beethoven's and the same Brahms symphony that another orchestra gave to our complete satisfaction two months ago, and the same Wagner prelude to Lohengrin (Ach! Himmel!) and Richard Strauss' Death and Transfiguration tone poem that has been lately heard. Some of these things are occasionally enjoyable, and there is no objection now to the said Strauss' work. Brahms' first symphony is more than welcome. But! Can't we ever have anything else? Is it any more difficult to play one piece in one city than another? For heaven's sake, shelve some of these compositions for awhile, or else do more than bring them out with a semblance of being brushed up into respectability!

Mr. Fiedler evidently understands the Brahms symphony, but the orchestra failed to interpret it. It had just such a humdrum reading as to block Brahms' proper recognition and unjustly label him as tiresome. Instead of that, there is a growing belief that his music is the music of the spheres and that many of the other harmonies we dub as "soulful" are effervescences that will rise in bubbles to the surface of time's stream and disappear. The symphony should have been crystalline; it was murky, and the third movement devoid of all point and delicacy. There was no appreciation of proportions, nor possibilities of voice-leadings. The result was like a poorly steneciled seal—indistinct, with not even the general outlines completely showing. Brahms has a good deal to say and says it well. This must be duly considered when his works are presented.

Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin is a scratchy abomination in the high-pitched string parts, more often than not. These set the teeth on edge last night.

Numerous examples during the course of the concert showed that composers are misusing the tympani. There are really many situations that do not require the use of these drums. A little thought ought to remedy this. Certainly, the use of instruments of percussion should be governed by musical and not program reasons.

Collectively, Baltimore was rude to Mr. Fiedler last night. Responsibility of concert-goers does not end with vouchsafing the regal presence of their august selves. It takes a mountain of marvels to move some of them to warmth; and, forgetting all the good that the retiring director has done, just because he did not heat them white hot with his work last night, they coldly got up out of their seats at the close and departed. All this speaks so well for the boasted manners and Southern hospitality of the city! It is well to learn little details of conduct in life; but none can afford to fawn over them, thus making them artificialities. How wonderful the world would be, if, with Shakespeare, we said to ourselves, and meant, "This, above all: to thine own self be true; and it must follow as the night the day, thou canst not, then, be false to any man."

J. N. H.

POST,

APRIL 6, 1912

BEETHOVEN ENTHRALLS VAST CROWD

Remarkable Demonstration of Delight at Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

For the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Fiedler took his courage in hand and gave a concert of Beethoven music: the third Leonore overture, the seventh and fifth symphony. The placing of two great symphonies by one composer on a single programme has not occurred in many years, if at all, in the history of the orchestra. In these days the attempt is a courageous one, and yesterday afternoon it succeeded amazingly well.

STAY AND APPLAUD

After each of the performances Mr. Fiedler was repeatedly recalled, and twice in the course of the concert the orchestra rose to its feet with him. Finally, at the end, an audience which usually grasps hat and gloves before the final chord and flies for the exits remained for fully five minutes applauding for all it was worth. The concert was felt to be in the nature of one of the farewell ceremonies, for the programme was so much after Mr. Fiedler's heart, and the music was interpreted with such characteristic enthusiasm and devotion.

Nearly all of the music sounded magnificently. This was first of all on account of the undying sincerity of music which, in contradistinction to the efforts of thousands of music-makers, was written through sheer necessity of expression, through a profound inner need—and secondly, the sincerity of the interpreter. Perhaps in these days our ears naturally and inevitably crave more contrast of color than is furnished in the course of an all-Beethoven programme by, say, the unobtrusive key-sequences of the seventh symphony, but, as a whole, the concert gave an astonishing amount of pleasure. Again, it should be emphasized, largely on account of the feeling for every note on the part of the conductor. Conductors find it necessary, in these days, to devote infinite pains to the preparation of a work by Strauss and Debussy, and by consequence the Beethoven symphonies and other works suffer, because they are so well-known and so likely to be accepted by any but genuine and full-hearted musicians as a feature of routine.

Brilliant and Dramatic

The performance of the overture was a brilliant and dramatic one, although each detail, too, was carefully observed and always perceptible in its correct proportions. The music is invincibly thrilling, as it was a couple of generations ago, as it will be for generations to come. For the farther the search the greater need for Beethoven's incomparable greatness of soul, for his all-embracing humanity. Art is not entirely a matter of style, and sincerity is still of some slight value to the artist and the public.

Moreover, this marvellously clear, clean, glowing, healthy instrumentation, and the elemental force of the music are still novel. Still, however, the music is adequately played; it moves one to the marrow. It is still marvellous to feel the sweep, the overwhelming might of the overture. The puissant swing of the introductory theme of the 7th symphony, in the wind instruments, as the strings dance rapturously up a Jacob's ladder of tone is an Olympic thing.

Finally, all were thrilled by what is deservedly and creditably to the public the most popular of symphonies, the symphony in C minor—by the opening that remains more titanic than anything accomplished lately, by the force which, one would imagine, would have cloven in twain the man who dared to handle it. To feel this consuming and replenishing energy, and the majesty of its expression, the superb arrangement of every phrase, every beam and arch of the structure, is one of the most intoxicating experiences that can befall the modern music

ADVERTISER, APRIL 6, 1912

SYMPHONY CONCERT ENTIRELY BEETHOVEN

CONTAINED NOTHING BUT ORCHESTRAL NUMBERS

Proof Anew How Infinitely More Versatile Beethoven Was Than Latter Day Composers.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. "Leonora, No. 3," overture.
Beethoven. Symphony in A major, No. 7.
Beethoven. Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

Not since the symphony concerts were started, more than a generation ago, has there been a programme of this character presented. Two large symphonies by the same composer, and a good-sized overture thrown in as "Lagniappe." Wagner programmes we have often had, but such a classical Beethoven programme never. Two symphonies! It is only a step from this to the Bulow idea of playing a symphony twice over, in the same concert, so that the laity may have a chance to study it. The laity are seldom grateful for such chances, since they do not generally take concerts in such a pedagogical manner, but this was a notable exception.

This concert was by no means as severe or taxing as many a previous one in which three or four modern composers have vied with each other in new progressions, heavy scoring or enigmatical meanings. It was a supreme test of Beethoven and it showed that no amount of modernity can dim his power or make him seem old-fashioned. It was a fine proof of the fact that our sheet anchor still holds and that we are not drifting aimlessly, to see the attention given to the works and the hearty applause following them.

Yet we would have preferred to have heard our well-beloved conductor in a Strauss or Wagner programme, where he seems so pre-eminent, rather than in a set of Beethoven works in which we have had many great readings. Nikisch, Muck, Gericke, Paur, have all done great things with this or that Beethoven symphony.

Such a programme proved how infinitely more versatile Beethoven was than the latter-day composers. There was not only no monotony in the concert, but there was excellent contrast. The "Leonora" overture, best of the dramatic school, was finely effective with its touches of sorrow, suspense, its trumpet calls, and its final delirium of triumph. When Beethoven was exultant his joy became a wild frenzy, as witness the end of this overture, or the end of the opera which follows it.

Against this there was the rather rustic dance vein of the first movement of the seventh symphony, which was finely caught up. And after this came the gem of the concert, the slow movement of this work, almost a threnody, yet having divine consolation in its second part—the essence of consolation and hope. And Mr. Fiedler did not dawdle the tempo of this "Allegretto," but gave it rather as pensive brooding than as a funeral march.

The scherzo of this symphony, with its unnecessary repetitions, is scarcely as strong as the first two movements, but the brilliant finale was exciting enough although taken a little too quick. Beethoven prized this work as the best of his symphonies, and with the exception noted it is certainly as strong as any of the nine.

The fifth symphony is the favorite warhorse of all conductors, but we question whether their enthusiasm is shared by all auditors. Of course there is a good deal to be made out of the "fate knocking at the door" figure, and of the struggle between the chief and subordinate themes, in the first movement, but if any auditors imagine that Beethoven had any idea of "Fate" when this four-noted figure came into his mind, let them examine the first sketch of the work as preserved to us by Nottebohm, and they will see that he thought of it only as a rather rollicking and chattering subject. The clearness with which all this ingenious figure-treatment was brought out wins admiration for both conductor and orchestra.

The strings were on dress parade in the variations of the slow movement and the bassoon at the end (in the coda) also deserves mention. But of course the contrabasses shone preeminent in the scherzo that followed. It is to be noticed that Beethoven made the contrabass part especially prominent and especially difficult in this symphony, possibly as a defiant answer to Von Weber who had satirized his difficult contrabass passages of the fourth symphony mercilessly. At any rate, these passages, which were once deemed almost impossible (as were the high violin passages in the "Egmont" overture) were by no means so to our great orchestra, and they were played with clearness and power.

The finale was again the triumphant Beethoven. It has been well said that this finale (the first use of the heroic trombones in sympathy is here) would have been the fittest ending to the "Eroica" symphony.

From all of the above it may be seen that the contrasts of the programme were as wide and vivid as the instrumental character of the scores could possibly give. It showed the sorrows, the joys, the playfulness, the romance, the intellectuality, and the tone-coloring of the Genius. It made it clear to the layman why it is that when we think of great composers we generally put Beethoven in the first place. Bach was greater in intellectuality, Schumann in pure romance, Chopin in emotional power, but no one presented intellect and emotion with such equipoise as Beethoven. Therefore it was well, for once, to have this object-lesson, to allow this innovation in the make-up of a symphony programme.

That the public enjoyed it was very evident. The applause was of the heartiest and was given after each work. We wonder if such marked applause after classical works is not also a remonstrance against the modern symphonic distortions.

One thing is certain! The public is showing its prizes Mr. Fiedler. "Blessings brighten as they take their flight." Whenever our conductor comes upon the stage he is welcomed with remarkable enthusiasm, and yesterday afternoon, at the end of the concert, instead of pinning on hats and rushing for trolleys, the public stayed to recall the conductor three times. The tribute was very pointed, for the applause went on after he had caused the orchestra to rise in response. No conductor has become a greater favorite in Boston than Mr. Max Fiedler.

HERALD,

MARCH 30, 1912.

SYMPHONY BY RACHMANINOFF

Mr. Fiedler and Orchestra Warmly Greeted on Return from New York.

INTERPRETATION VIGOROUS

Mr. Noack Unable to Appear Because of Injury Due to Fall.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rachmaninoff, Symphony in E minor, No. 2; Bruch, concerto in G minor, No. 1, for violin and orchestra; Mendelssohn, overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

It had been announced that Mr. Noack would play a violin concerto by Mozart; but he fell and injured his wrist so that his appearance as a soloist was necessarily deferred. Miss Collier took his place at short notice. She expected to play later in the season. There were agreeable features in her performance of the first and second movements of Bruch's concerto; but however estimable her talent may be, she has not yet fully attained to the artistic stature which should entitle her to play at these concerts. Yesterday she was applauded liberally.

Mr. Fiedler was warmly greeted on his return from the last trip of the orchestra to New York and other cities, and his reading of the symphony evidently gave great pleasure to the audience, yet this symphony has been played here with more marked technical brilliance and with greater regard to nuances of expression. Yesterday the performance was steadily vigorous; one might even use the word muscular. Yet in its way this reading was effective by dint of sonorousness.

The symphony was played twice last season. It was immediately enjoyed by many; some praised it extravagantly, and one or two, I believe, described it as "epoch-making." The music does not wear well; its diffuseness is more and more apparent, and in a symphony that lasts nearly an hour, there is really little musical thought that is taken away by the hearer. The broad and sweeping themes are often Tschaikowskian in profile and in harmonic and orchestral dress, and there are instances of Tschaikowskian detail. It is natural that Rachmaninoff should be influenced in a measure by his predecessor, but it is also natural to expect from the composer of "The Island of the Dead" a stronger revelation of individuality.

It is easy to see why this work stirs an audience, especially when it is performed in a flamboyant manner: there are obvious melodies, and I am not denying the effectiveness of some of them; there is pomp and there is glitter; there are climaxes—too many of them; there is decorative music galore.

Would that Mendelssohn had written always in the spirit of the overture played yesterday and in that of "Fingal's Cave"! Would that he had not fallen into the evil ways of formalism and sentimentalism and wallowed there!

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Beethoven's overture "Leonora," No. 3; symphony in A major, No. 7; symphony in C minor, No.

From WORLD (N.Y. EDN)

Address New York

Date MAR 24 19

The twenty-fifth consecutive season of concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to an end with the fifth and last concert of the present series given in the Academy of Music last Friday evening. Incidentally this concert marked the last appearance in this city of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for his engagement with the orchestra ends at the close of the present season in May, when he will return to Germany. Next season and for a term of years to follow the orchestra will have as its conductor Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded four years ago. The soloist was Mme. Louise Homer, the popular contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House.

[177]

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 30, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

RACHMANINOFF'S SYMPHONY ONCE MORE

An Eager Audience Renews Its Pleasure in It—The Music Under a Second Hearing—The Enduring Virtues and the Intruding Shortcomings—Mendelssohn and a Little Masterpiece—Cordialities for Mr. Fiedler.

PERHAPS taking the cue from incidents at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra last week in New York, Mr. Fiedler's following here made a beginning yesterday of demonstrative leave-takings. The conductor was applauded long and loudly when he first appeared on the stage on his way to his place. The applause was renewed at each pause in Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, which began the concert, though a part of the clapping was no doubt intended for the piece which the audience evidently recalled and enjoyed. At the end the applause waxed anew, twice and thrice was the conductor recalled. He waved his arms comprehensively and paternally to his men; they rose; and the clapping redoubled. So ran a very applausive afternoon, wherein Mr. Fiedler also enjoyed the very obvious "homage" of Miss Collier, the violinist of the occasion. Report said that she owed her appearance to Mr. Fiedler's good voices, and time and again, her eyes sought the conductor's face with youthful reliance and smiling admiration. Throughout the concert, Mr. Fiedler strove mightily and visibly with the orchestra to gain the expressive eloquence that he sought. Since his earliest days here, he has seldom conducted so laboriously and with so many physical ardors. Yet the orchestra has played often under him with tone of finer texture, smoother surface and more incisive brilliance. It has also been much more eloquent with this same symphony of Rachmaninoff. Until it reached the twitter and patter of the strings and the lovely song and the suffused phrases of the wood-winds in Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the orchestra decidedly had an off day.

Rachmaninoff's second symphony, which filled an hour of the concert, came to an interesting test. When it was first performed here in the autumn of 1910, it was received with uncommon interest and liking. Since the days of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" no new symphony by a contemporary hand had called forth such warm and general admiration. It was repeated "by general request" within a month, and it was played many times in the course of the season by the orchestra in other cities. Yesterday, after an interval of fifteen months, it stood again on the programme of the concerts. By every token that the audience could give, the music and the performance renewed the anticipated pleasure. Yet, like so many other of the pieces by the Russian composers, wholly nationalized or partly Germanized (as is Rachmaninoff) the symphony seemed hardly so engrossing and impressive as it did at the earlier hearings. Moreover, though the performance occasionally lagged, the occasional disappointment and disillusion can hardly be laid at its door. Inevitably, the symphony thrilled at those earlier performances. In it was music upspringing from long-breathed melodies that from the moment when they were first proclaimed caught the listener's ear and held his imagination. These melodic thoughts in themselves and as they developed were clothed in all the sumptuous or vivid sonorities of contemporary harmony and instrumentation. Rachmaninoff was writing a very colorful, a very highly accented, a very ardent and eloquent music. More: he seemed to have imbibed the contemporary zeal to make a symphony, "absolute" music though it is, a drama, distilled and concentrated into tones. A reiterated musical thought, published at the beginning of the symphony, recurred often in its course, swelled, toward the close, seemed finally to dominate it. Other melodic ideas strove with it, strove with themselves. As the contest waxed or waned, there were passages of tumultuous agitation, moments of sharp or mocking outcry, moods of sustained and mounting passion, ironic episodes and contrasts. The listener followed this strife of ideas and emotions eagerly, with what—to borrow a term of the theatre—may be called tonal illusion.

It was possible and easy to do so again before the symphony yesterday afternoon. Again the music, again the chief musical thought, seemed to emerge out of the tonal blackness in which Rachmaninoff begins. Again music and orchestra tossed in feverish and passionate agitation or freed and soothed themselves in aspiring song. The scherzo ran as wildly and moodily as of old, and once more the strange and fugal chant seemed to mock its bodily revellings with the things of the spirit. The adagio renewed the passion of its rising and falling song. The finale once more asserted the zest of living, of struggle, of victory and bore the chief theme almost to apotheosis upon the passion of the preceding song. Then suddenly, as in all the other movements, it ended as though Fate had set an abrupt period to it, thrust the striving, the almost triumphant, mortal force back into the pit of darkness again. So it had cut the first movement and the scherzo; so it had summarily hushed the slow song. And the listener heard this drama played on the vivid and moving stage of contemporary music, with its glowing or biting harmonies, with its endless play of the light and shadows of orchestral coloring.

The listener received anew all these fine sensations yesterday, but his increasing familiarity with the music made him take involuntary thought of detracting or clouding circumstance along the way. Perhaps, Rachmaninoff's drama in tones is a somewhat long-winded drama. The composer will not forsake the passionate song of the Adagio until he has wrung the last drop out of it. The tumultuous agitations of the first movement, the whirl of the scherzo, the ardors of the finale spare not in repititions. Rachmaninoff has the Russian imagination and spirit that surrender themselves to these moods and give them eloquent expression; he has also the Russian instinct to repetitions. The nights are long in Russia; and so are concerts and so is music there. The Russian temperament is a receptive temperament, and the huge Brucknerian crescendo and climax have become a mighty fashion, for the time, in contemporary music. So Rachmaninoff's song rises upon itself, swells, breaks, dissolves into the shimmering tones of the violins or into the shadowed voices of the horns. There is no reminiscence in Rachmaninoff's symphony. There is rather the following of current symphonic fashions—of Bruckner in these climaxes, of Tschaikowsky in occasional emphasis, of Rimsky-Korsakoff in the momentary and vivid intrusion of single instruments, like the mocking bassoons of the finale. Rachmaninoff's other piece familiar here, "The Isle of the Dead," seemed to us such a tone-poem as Brahms might have written, had tone-poems been the fashion of his time and had he possessed the tone-painting instinct. This second symphony, with all its exaltations of feeling and its gravities of expression and workmanship is too feverish and passionate of spirit to be of a Slavonic Brahms. The moody and nervous Slav, though he live and work in Dresden and his countrymen call him Germanized, will out in it. Perhaps we listeners of 1912 have the warnings of the past too vividly before us. We know, to weariness, how Wagner's generation rejected and derided his music. In our fear lest we make the same error and expose ourselves to the same scorn of generations to come, we have rushed to the other extreme with the composers of our own time. We are fearful lest we should under-praise them or hear with dull ears. Perhaps we in Boston, in prey to such desires, have a little over-estimated this symphony of Rachmaninoff.

Rachmaninoff, we say truly and cheerfully, has used imaginatively the harmonic ways and means, the glowing and variegated instrumental palette of modern music. But, how modern, after all, are some of these harmonic dances and instrumental colorings, and what shall it profit the composer how many or how few he uses so long as he gains his imaginative and expressive end. Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ended the concert—a repertory piece, a hackneyed repertory piece, if there ever was one. It is possible to hear it year after year, once, twice and thrice in a single season. Yet it is impossible to hear it without fresh admiration, even emotion, for the inventive, imaginative and delineative sense with which Mendelssohn uses the harmonic and instrumental coloring for his fairies, for his voices of night and moonlight and still woodland, for his revels of clowns, for his pomps of courts, for the whole atmosphere of poetic fantasy that he would have his overture weave. Imagine a composer of the hour, spurred out of his heart and mind, as Mendelssohn was, to write an overture to Shakspeare's play. He might be more intricate, he could hardly be more fortunate, with the fairy lilting and pitty-patting of his strings at the beginning, with the suffused and evanescent voices of his clarinets and his horns for the mystery, the loveliness, the stillness of fairy night. He might even be less apt with his measures for clown and courtier. Our music becomes more dramatic, more pictorial, more atmospheric each year. Our composers strive—and often achieve. Yet Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture remains a masterpiece of preluding to a tragic drama and Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" a masterpiece of preluding to fantastic comedy.

Between whiles, Miss Bessie Bell Collier, called at last to the Symphony Concerts, of which she has been long ambitious, played Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor. She played it amiably and prettily, with a bright little tone, a pleasant sense of rhythm and climax, not too accurate an ear and unfailing a hand for true intonation, and without much variety of expression—if indeed Bruch's pedagogical "violinistic" music has any expressive quality. Miss Collier's performance of the piece was not disagreeable; it would have had its just place in many a concert. But it was not for the Symphony Concerts accustomed to call only violinists of high rank and large and individual attainment. Each year, the conductor and the management swear by all the high gods of musical art that they will summon no soloist below their just standards. And each year they yield, as they yielded yesterday with Miss Collier. The annual exception is becoming an annual rule.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, APRIL 6, 1912

NOVELTIES AT THE SYMPHONY

A VAST amount of rubbish is printed about the prejudice against the American composer and there is a ceaseless wail going upward that his music is not given a hearing. Very good; now let us have a glance at statistics, says the critic of the New York Sun. Since Mr. Fiedler took command of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he has produced 54 novelties. Of these 12, or almost 25 per cent., have been by Americans.

Here are the titles of some of them: Suite for strings by Arthur Foote, symphonic poem, "Ormzad," by F. S. Converse; "Suite Symphonique," by George W. Chadwick; theme, variations and fugue for organ and orchestra, and also a sinfonietta, by the same composer; a symphony and an overture, by Gustav Strube; first performance of MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia"; symphonic poem, "Atala," by A. M. Curry; Henry Hadley's symphonic poem "The Culprit Fay," H. F. B. Gilbert's comedy overture on negro themes, Maquarre's symphonic poem "On the Sea Cliffs."

There was also a symphonic poem "Norway," by Philip Greeley Clapp, which was given at a Cambridge concert, but did not get into the Boston programs. This makes a total of 13 American works accorded hearings under Mr. Fiedler's baton.

The representation of other nationalities was headed by that of the Germans, who had 14 works produced. This includes the "Jena" symphony of Beethoven and a work by Busoni, who is musically German. French composers, among whom Enesco has been counted, record six productions. The Englishmen have also six by three writers, Elgar, Bantock and Delius; the Italians two and the Russians six. Sibelius, the Finn, had six new works placed to his credit, and other novelties were Paderewski's symphony and a piece by Sinding.

APRIL 6, 1912.

JOURNAL—

ALL BEETHOVEN PROGRAM GIVEN

Symphony Holds Its First Good Friday Matinee in Several Years.

Yesterday's Symphony matinee was the first given on Good Friday afternoon for several years; but as no allowance was made at the beginning of the season for a change of date, the so-called rehearsal had to be given according to the ticket. Nor was any particular attention paid to the day in the program that Mr. Fiedler arranged, although the famous allegretto in the seventh Beethoven symphony, with its melancholy theme, strongly suggested the somber character of the day.

There was a large audience, but a performance of Beethoven's great fifth symphony by the finest orchestra in the land deserves nothing less than a crowded auditorium. There is an all-Beethoven program this week, including the fifth and seventh symphonies and the third "Leonora" overture, and yesterday the audience gave Mr Fiedler and the players an ovation after the brilliant performance of the overture and lingered in the hall after the last thrilling chords of the fifth symphony to give the orchestral heroes of the occasion still another.

Mr. Fiedler was in fine fettle yesterday. He conducted the whole concert without a score and consequently he was able to give full rein to his enthusiasm. He brought out the same three works last year and also during his first season, and on all these occasions he has found the orchestra well able to second his efforts.

The orchestra leaves town this afternoon for Mr. Fiedler's farewell tour of the Middle West.

GLOBE—

APRIL 6, 1912.

BEETHOVEN PROGRAM.

Leonora Overture and Fifth and Seventh Symphonies Heard at 21st Rehearsal Yesterday.

The program of the 21st symphony rehearsal yesterday was devoted to Beethoven, including the Leonora overture No. 3, the seventh and fifth symphonies.

About seven years intervened between the composition of the latter two. There is a boldness in modulation in the later not to be found in the fifth, as the progressions in the first movement from a minor tonality to a major one a semitone below, unrelated keys, yet suggestive in this transition of a new vista of poetic beauty.

The second movement of the seventh is a treatise in itself upon compact, yet fertile and imaginative development of a few musical ideas, development which finds freshness and novelty in expanded melodic form, in enriched counterpoint, in embellished harmonic and orchestral dress. Yet the movement has less universal appeal than the corresponding one of the fifth.

The playing of the overture was the feature of the afternoon. The tonal qualities of the orchestra in pianissimo have never seemed more pure or golden. The contrasting dramatic passages stood out in bold and effective relief. Thus far Mr Fiedler's conducting was commendable.

In the seventh symphony the type of leadership began to appear which needs no comment. There are few string choirs with the virtuosity to scramble through the finale at the speed of yesterday. Such precipitation has neither poise nor celerity, and is rather the reverse of inspiriting. He had a keen ear who could detect the outline of the musical figure even from the violinists.

There will be no concerts next week in the event of the orchestra's absence on its last Western tour.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 2, 1912

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS IN THE CONCERT-ROOM

The Changes and the Betterments of the Year—A Dinner to Bring Harvard and the Opera Closer—The Present End of "Mona"—Miss Farrar Reappears as Manon—American Audiences and American Reviewers—Items as They Pass

THE concert season wanes. Before many weeks, for the last times in the current musical year, audiences, orchestras, pianists, violinists, singers, the makers of music generally—not to forget the harmless, necessary reviewers—will sit down together in Symphony or Jordan or Steinert Hall. Before the twilight has quite fallen the changes and the betterments in the manners and customs of our concert-rooms, on the platform and in the auditoriums, deserve the recording word. The battle against the hats at the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra was fought and won a year ago. This season they have vanished as soon as the wearer has taken her seat—to remain in hiding until the final numbers of the programme begin. Then up have gone hats, hands and hatpins, and the concerts have usually finished amid prodding arms and readjusted millinery. Whereat the sensitive have much and increasingly repined. There have been skirmishes over this rehatting. There may be pitched battles next year. A patient and wily management may even be asked to save the last item of its weekly programme from this disturbance to the eyes and ears of the complaining. On the other hand, to Jordan and to Steinert Hall the custom of a hatless audience in the afternoon is creditably and considerately spreading. Nor has the vice of departures just before the final piece gained the footing in our concert-halls that it has in New York.

On the platforms, too, there have been happy changes. The French and the German singers, especially, are forswearing the encumbering hats and gloves that custom has laid upon the head and the hands of singers in concerts in the afternoon. Those courageous women—for precedent and fashions are strong among singers—gain in freedom for themselves, in air of intimacy with the audience; while it may hear the music without distraction by the modes. Flowers, happily, become fewer and fewer in our concert rooms. The "best" singers and the "best" audiences are mutually shy of these "offerings" with their suggestion of a dying provinciality and "personal tribute." Rapt attention and genuine and quick applause are better rewards. Happiest change of all, the announcing of extra pieces by title and by the name of the composer has at last begun. A few singers and virtuosi dared the practice in Germany and England and they have borne it, like Miss Gerhardt, to America also. To make these announcements informs a curious audience and gives them clew to the mood and the matter of the song. They ought to become a requirement and a habit in our concerts.

H. T. P.

GLOBE—

MARCH 30, 1912.

MISS COLLIER PLAYS BRUCH CONCERTO

Boston Violiniste Gives Fine Performance.

Rachmaninoff's Noble Symphony Heartily Applauded.

Miss Bessie Bell Collier, the young Boston violiniste, played Bruch's concerto in G minor at the 20th symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon. Miss Collier appeared at short notice on account of an injury to the wrist sustained by Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, who was announced as the soloist of the week.

Miss Collier acquitted herself with great credit and won an unusually enthusiastic reception from both audience and orchestra. She played with marked technical proficiency and with musical taste. Her grasp of the composition was firm and her discrimination of its variety in style was intelligent.

She displayed facility in passages demanding a florid execution and sincerity and depth of sentiment in measures of lyric character, as in the slow movement. Here her tone was of a pure, singing quality, and her bowing of marked breath and elasticity. She has a keen sense of nuance as of rhythm, and is able to impart a quiet and impressive beauty to a piece of cantilena without mannerisms or exaggeration.

She showed admirable presence of mind in the readjustment of the tuning of her instrument, an insistent matter which caused her some axiety in the double stopping of the brilliant finale, but she came off scarcely less happily in intonation than in the other requisites of the art.

Best of all Miss Collier's ability does not lie in digital expertness, nor in a precise articulation of the bow—a thing not to be underrated. Her playing indicates a refined mind, sensibility to emotion and a respect for her instrument as a medium for interpretation rather than of mere display.

This was a significant point in Miss Collier's career, for although she played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Worcester festival in October, 1905 (Saint-Saens, Rondo Capriccioso), Mr Kneisel conducting, and the concerto of yesterday at Cambridge, Nov 17, 1910, this was her first appearance with it in Boston.

Born at Cohasset, Mass, April 3, 1885, Miss Collier began violin lessons at four with Mrs Charles W. Gammons. At five she played in a concert. At eight she began study with Mr Kneisel whose pupil she remained for 10 years, with intermittent instruction from Willy Krafft and Mr Svecenski.

Miss Collier made her debut Dec 19, 1904, in a concert at Steinert Hall, and has played publicly as follows: Nov 7, 1905, Raff Concerto with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra; Nov 12, 1910, Bruch G Minor Concerto with the New York Symphony Orchestra at Brooklyn; the Saint-Saens B Minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Brooklyn, Feb 23, 1912; a tour through the West in 1908, and various concerts through New England, and the Middle States.

The symphony was Rachmaninoff's second in E minor. It occupied exactly an hour in performance, too long a time for the ear and brain to remain keenly appreciative, and unfortunately so, for there is a wealth of invention here, of expressive musical thought, of fertile development of ideas, and of originality, charm and dramatic force of orchestral treatment.

It would be interesting to trace the genealogy of the chief theme, which is a motto for the entire work. Puccini last night, in his latest opera, as well as Bantock, has found use for the formula, as have others. The first movement is laid out upon a plan at once coherent, yet seemingly spontaneous. The second movement is in fine contrast, with its spirit of play, which never loses the spell of imagination. The third movement contains beautiful thoughts, but is unduly prolonged, and is deliberated rather than inspired until the happy return of the motto theme. The last movement contains some of the Russian's most forceful pages.

The orchestra played superbly, and Mr Fiedler conducted at times with a sensibility of touch that he has shown too seldom. He was greeted with longer applause than usual when he mounted the stand. There was a demonstration for conductor and players after the symphony. Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" closed the program.

The next concerts will occur April 5 and 6. The program will be of Beethoven, as follows: "Leonora" overture No. [illegible] and 5.

From EVENING MAIL

Address New York

Date

That the end of the season is approaching may be realized from the fact that all announcements bear the significant words, "last of the series." The Boston symphony concert of this afternoon closes not only the season's concerts, but it brings to an end the relation of Max Fiedler and that great orchestra. No man ever filled a more difficult position than he, following Dr. Muck, who had become a veritable idol, and to yield the post back to that conductor Mr. Fiedler is leaving.

At first he was compelled to make the public forget its hero, and it was not easy. Little by little Mr. Fiedler by dint of his dignity and worth as a man no less than as a musician won a place for himself and a respect which will follow him wherever he may go. There should have been a place in New York for Mr. Fiedler, and the loss is ours that he was not retained.

We may only wish that when musical matters roll around again so that things may be readjusted Mr. Fiedler will not be so tied by contracts that he cannot come back. There will always be a warm welcome for him. He has done much to supply some of the finest orchestral music that we have been privileged to enjoy.

MONITOR.

APRIL 4, 1912

The majority of the men of the chorus will return. They are all Italians. The ballet will be reengaged as far as possible. The native dancers have proved satisfactory but not easy to obtain. Contracts with all the field imply full time work and pay by the week.

Karl Muck, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra for the next five years, will direct the music festival of the lower Rhine cities, held this summer at Aachen.

Included in the cities of the festival, besides Aachen, are Duesseldorf and Cologne. These places combine their choruses and orchestras and give an extended program. The management of the Berlin opera has altered its plans in order to have Dr. Muck direct a complete new study which it has made of the Wagner Ring music dramas. The date of the production was moved back eight months in order to permit this. Dr. Muck's part in the Bayreuth festival will be to direct all the "Parsifal" performances, numbering seven. He sails for America Sept. 24.

The importance of Dr. Muck's engagement in Boston to conduct orchestral programs exclusively is to be gathered from this statement of his activities in Germany during the next few months. During the winter of 1912-13, two out of the four most eminent conductors in the world will be at the service of musical Boston. Muck will be here, directing symphonies; Weingartner, directing operas. Each man is as great in the field of the other as he is in his own. With an opera house right at his door, Dr. Muck will not be able to show Bostonians his talents as an interpreter of lyric drama. With a specialized group of symphony players in his neighborhood, Mr. Weingartner will not have the privilege of disclosing to the full his capacity as an interpreter of concert orchestra scores. Dr. Muck knows Berlin as a place where he can exercise his entire artistic gifts for the good of the community. Mr. Weingartner knows Berlin in the same way. Both men will know Boston as a place where they are tested in only a half of their powers. Such is the meaning of America as a purchasing power, rather than an originating power, in art. It can afford to buy a fraction of a man's gifts and let the rest go unused. The cooperative day in music is some time away, five years away at least, according to the indentures which bind Karl Muck and Felix Weingartner to the service of the Boston public.

From TIMES

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. MAR 23 1912

Date

MAX FIEDLER HONORED.

The Boston Sympphony Orchestra gave the last of the Brooklyn series of concerts for the season at the Academy of Music. The occasion had a significantly personal character, in that it was the last appearance of Max Fiedler, the conductor, who retires from the leadership of the orchestra after a period of four years. Mr. Fiedler's appearance was the signal for a reception of the most cordial kind. For about two minutes he was kept bowing his acknowledgments of applause as spontaneous as it was unanimous. During the intermission A. Augustus made an address on behalf of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Institute, in which he expressed appreciation of the work Mr. Fiedler had done in the four years of his service—"the work of a superb leader and a superb orchestra. Mr. Fiedler responded in a brief speech, simple, direct and sincere, which was received with great applause. As the men arose in acknowledgment of their inclusion, both they and Mr. Fiedler were kept standing by the renewed demonstration. Two immense laurel wreaths were presented to the retiring conductor.

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" was the first number, followed by the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss. This descriptive work, which the composer prefers should be presented without prefatory notes or analysis, is in one movement with three subdivisions. It is illustrative of a day in the composer's family life, and is further described by him, "party lyrical and partly humorous—a triple fugue, the three subjects representing papa, mamma and the baby."

It is safe to say that without prior suggestion interpretation of the symphony would be as varied as the individual imaginations of those present. There are rare oases of musical appeal, in a musical fabric which is an amazing example of contrapuntal fertility and ingenity. The attitude of the audience was a compound of perplexity, deferred hope and curiosity. The applause which followed was a tribute to Mr. Fiedler's sound and scholarly musicianship, and the splendid work of his men rather than for the work itself. Happy memory of the programme will rest upon the exquisite rendition of the "Siegfried Idyl" and the eloquent beauty and impressive playing of Beethoven's noble "Leonore Overture." Flawless beauty of tone and perfect balance marked the number, which Mr. Fiedler said he would leave with his auditors instead of a formal good-by.

Mme. Louise Homer was the soloist, delighting the audience with the richness of her tone and the breadth and dignity of her singing. Her numbers were Liszt's "The Loreley" and Lia's Recitative and Aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," both with orchestra. Mme. Homer's voice grows in beauty and fulness, especially in the upper register. She was generously applauded.

Demonstrations for Mr. Fiedler were renewed at the conclusion of the programme.

From EVENING WORLD

Address New York

Date MAR 25 1912

MAX FIEDLER'S FAREWELL A MEMORABLE INCIDENT.

Max Fiedler, directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its farewell concert of the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, evoked a remarkable demonstration. Mr. Fiedler is taking his leave of us, more's the pity. Why this man, with his genius for training and conducting an orchestra, for four years leader of the finest band in America, the reputation of which he has nobly maintained, should be permitted to depart from America passeth understanding. He cannot, however, fail to appreciate the affection and esteem and admiration which the New York music lovers entertain for him. The audiences that attend the Boston Symphony Concerts are of New York's musical elect. They are aristocratic, wealthy and, usually, slow to manifest feeling. It meant something—it meant a great deal—when the vast throng that crowded the house on Saturday afternoon rose as one man at the close of the concert and cheered—actually cheered—shouted words of commendation and goodby; waved hats and handkerchiefs, and, in fact, disclosed the great heart that usually it takes pains to hide.

"I am unhappy to leave you!" said Mr. Fiedler, when, after a score of recalls, he found his voice. "Do not too soon forget me!"

From AMERICAN

Address New York

Date MAR 24 1912

NOTABLE TRIBUTE TO MAX FIEDLER

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to an end yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with an almost unprecedented display of feeling an enthusiasm. A demonstration of some sort might have been expected, for, although the programme offered no novelty, it was known two weeks ago that the entire house had been sold out for yesterday's concert.

The last appearance of Max Fielder at the conductor's desk was evidently the cause of the unusually large house and, after the programme yesterday, the dignified audience rose in a mass, the ladies waved handkerchiefs and programmes, while the men raised their hats high in the air and cheered until Mr. Fielder had returned six times and finally raised his hands for silence.

When the house was quieted, Mr. Fiedler said: "Ladies and gentlemen, I am more successful conducting an orchestra than I am conducting a speech, but I want to tell you how grateful I am for your continued help and sympathy. For four years you have helped me with your kindness and enthusiasm, and now that I am going to leave you, I beg that you wont forget me too soon."

The musical part of the afternoon was in keeping with the usual high plane of the Boston Orchestra's work. Strauss' "Symfonia Domestica," in one movement, was the large number, and with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" constituted the first half of the concert.

Wagner contributed three numbers: "The Siegfried Idyl," Funeral Maroh" from "Goetterdammerung," and the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde."

From CITIZENS

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date MAR 23 1912

MAX FIEDLER BIDS FAREWELL

Last Appearance With Boston Orchestra.

ADDRESS OF APPRECIATION FOLLOWED BY AN OVATION

Some Splendid Tonal Effects—The Strauss "Symphonia Domestica" a Feature—Five Concerts Under Dr. Muck Next Year.

It was Max Fiedler's farewell appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, as he will soon return abroad to be succeeded here by Dr. Carl Muck. The esteem in which he has come to be held by Brooklyn music lovers was amply attested by the enthusiastic reception accorded him upon his entrance and the ovation later, when, after the intermission, A. Augustus Healey, on behalf of the directors of the Philharmonic Society, thanked him for the great pleasure he had afforded during four years by his "superb conducting of a superb orchestra," and also thanked him on behalf of the audience which occupied every seat and box, with a number of standees in rear.

Dr. Fiedler was also presented with two huge wreaths of laurel, and when, evidently considerably moved, he, halting, expressed his gratification at the evidences of affection and sympathy and said that he would rather say farewell through the last number on the programme, Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, the applause reached a high pitch of enthusiasm. At the conclusion of the concert the audience stood and applauded Conductor Fiedler for several minutes.

The overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz," with which the programme opened, has been played so many times this year as to have become a bit too familiar, yet as played last evening it can still give great pleasure. As always, the orchestra's tone was a delight throughout, rich, warm, true. And this alone would have made the reading of the overture worth hearing, to say nothing of the expressiveness of Conductor Fiedler's interpretation.

The most interesting number, though rather wearisome toward the end, was Strauss' unique "Symphonia Domestica," in one movement. It was first performed in this country in 1904 during the Richard Strauss Festival, and has seldom been heard since. It is characteristic of the composer, with many exquisite bits for the woodwinds, measures that sing a rare melody, dashes of dissonance and crashes of sound that at first sound like rough discords, but before they have ceased sounding come to be accepted as an integral part of the whole. It attempts to depict a day and a night in a home, with some delicious bits when the child wearies, is put to bed and falls asleep to dream. There are jocose moments, litle episodes that suggest quarreling of a mild sort, with other moments of calm contemplation and happiness. Altogether, it is a more than reasonably successful attempt at pictorial music.

Mme. Louise Homer, long a favorite with Brooklyn audiences, was the soloist, singing Liszt's "Die Lorelei," with orchestral accompaniment, and a recitative and aria of "Lia" from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Of the cold which prevented her appearing with the orchestra in Manhattan on Thursday night there were few traces, and the popular contralto's voice and artistry and engaging personality won much enthusiasm and a number of recalls.

A satisfying reading of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and a tonally splendid interpretation of the "Leonore" overture were the other orchestral numbers. The opening tonal effects in the overture were as beautiful as any this fine orchestra has ever achieved in Brooklyn.

Under Dr. Muck the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts on Friday evenings next season. The dates will be Nov. 8 and Dec. 6, 1912, and Jan. 10, Feb. 21 and March 21, 1913.

Conductor Fiedler was the guest of honor last night at a dinner given by Gustav Heubach at his residence, No. 184 Eighth avenue. About sixty persons were present, and as all were well acquainted with the host and his guest of honor, formalities were dispensed with and a thoroughly delightful evening was had.

Conductor Fiedler is the guest of the Heubachs each year that his musical organization is booked in this city. There was some music last night, several of the guests singing German airs.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address Pittsburg Pa.

Date APR 9 1912

BOSTON MUSICIANS CLOSE THE ORCHESTRAL SEASON

The last in a series of five orchestral concerts was given by the Pittsburg Orchestra association last night in Memorial hall, when the Boston Symphony players, under the direction of Max Fiedler, presented a splendid program. The musicians were assisted by Alwin Schroeder, violin soloist. While the audience attending this year's concert by the Boston orchestra was not so large as that of last year, it was the largest in attendance during the series.

Franz Schubert's symphony in B Minor, commonly called "The Unfinished," was played by the orchestra. The interpretation given by Fiedler and his players was faultless, the exquisite poetry and the phrasing and dynamics being perfectly rendered. Schroeder, who is much admired in

BOSTON [illegible] PHONY ENDS MOST BRILLIANT SEASON

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the fifth and last concert for the season at Infantry hall last evening, before a large audience. Max Fiedler, who has eminently conducted the orchestra for four years, made his last appearance as leader.

Mr. Fiedler was greeted with an ovation, and genuine regret was expresed at his departure. He will be succeeded next fall by Dr. Karl Muck, who has attained a creditable reputation as a musician and drector, and who was formerly a conductor of the splendid organization from Boston.

Josef Hofmann, the brilliant pianist, was the soloist. The program follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72....Beethoven

Concerto No. 2, F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 21.....Chopin

I. Maestoso.

II. Larghetto.

III. Allegro vivace.

A "Faust" Overture.....Wagner

"A Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner

Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner

The rendition of the various selections last evening were replete with all the technicalities and able musical delicacies admirably suited to the excerpts offered. The audience took frequent advantage of demonstrating keen appreciation by enthusiastic applause.

As a leader, Mr. Fiedler has always been inspiring. His work is artistic and consistent. The compositions of the great masters are brought out in most capable manner, and the hall last evening fairly resounded with exquisite harmony.

Hofmann's playing of Chopin's F minor concerto was superbly characteristic of his capability. The soloist displayed masterful musicianship and symmetrical interpretation. His grand work was greeted with a flattering ovation. The whole program rounded out into a most delightful entertainment, and it is to be regretted that the orchestra will not return here until next fall.

[179]

From EVE. POST.

Address New York City.

Date MAR 22 1912

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Mr. Fiedler's Last Evening Concert.

At last night's Boston Symphony concert, Mr. Fiedler's last but one in New York, his friends made a great demonstration of enthusiasm, which must greatly have pleased the recipient. The programme had to be somewhat changed, as Mme. Homer, who was to have sung, could not appear on account of a cold. The programme stood finally as follows: Beethoven's "Lenora" overture No. 3, Brahms's first symphony, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture, the "Lohengrin" prelude, and the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel.

Mr. Fiedler gave a conventional performance of Beethoven's overture, and, like most conductors, played the final climax barely fortissimo, instead of with three ffs, as the score is marked.

In Brahms, as well as in Richard Strauss, the Boston Orchestra is always at its best, but even their splendid playing of the first symphony fails to make it interesting, except here and there. The opening measures are superb, and, with their persistent drumbeat and melancholy color, remind one of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony. Mr. Fiedler and his men made the last movement very effective, especially the beautiful episode of the brasses and the Beethoven Hymn to Joy, which Brahms so wisely adopted. He usually recognized inspired music even if he was seldom able to create it himself.

The three Wagner overtures were played with spirit. Mr. Fiedler and his men were most cordially applauded, and the evening audience bade good-by to the present conductor with every expression of cordial regard.

To-morrow afternoon's programme, like that of last night, will end with three Wagner numbers, the "Siegfried Idyl," the "Götterdämmerung" funeral march, and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from Tristan. The symphonic number will be Strauss's "Domestica," and Weber's "Freischütz" overture will be the opening number.

POST,

MARCH 30, 1912

MISS COLLIER AS VIRTUOSO

Is Brilliant Success as Symphony Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony was the big orchestral piece yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, and in many respects it is a superb work. It was heartily applauded. The other orchestral piece was the overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Between these two compositions came Miss Bessie Bell Collier of this city, who had substituted for Sylvain Noack, as soloist of the occasion, and who played the Bruch G minor violin concerto.

Mr. Noack, the second concertmeister of the orchestra, who was to have appeared as soloist, had slightly injured his wrist. Miss Collier substituted at very short notice, and made the most of her opportunity. Her performance was in the first place remarkably contagious. Young people only should play this concerto, for it is fast getting old. Miss Collier modestly but with firmness played this music as if she had learned it in the fulness of her heart and were playing it for the first time anywhere; and there are few violinists in the ranks today who can accomplish what she accomplished without effrontery or affectation, by sheer virtue of her musical nature and solid musicianship, her unvarnished sincerity and absorption in her task.

For once, also, there was a fitting orchestral accompaniment. For one thing, Miss Collier was sure of herself, had thought out everything carefully in advance. She appeared exceptionally in the vein, yet her enthusiasm was admirably and rarely blended with authority and self-control.

The Rachmaninoff symphony is one of the two finest works of the composer for orchestra—the other one, even finer, is the symphonic poem, "The Isle of the Dead"—and one of the most brilliant and effective of modern symphonies. It is like music of Mendelssohn in its wonderful fluency and ease and finish of workmanship, and even, somewhat, in its musical content. This although Rachmaninoff is sometimes very near to Tschaikowsky in his manner.

He never goes so deep; but his emotion is, nevertheless, profound and that of a passionate and introspective nature. The symphony, especially in the first movement, is, if anything, over-rich in ideas. The recurrence of a pervading theme is one of its characteristics, after the modern method, a method that becomes the more logical and unavoidable as time goes on. The slow movement is the poorest of the three, and the glitter and "go" of the finale comes perilously close to the superficial. But the work is most enjoyable for its rich and ever-changing color, its continuous rhythmic sweep, its variety and ingenuity of detail and its climactic power. It was magnificently played, and it is no wonder that Fiedler was loudly applauded and he and his men called to their feet after the performance. Miss Collier had been similarly honored. The poetical overture of

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 6, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A BEETHOVEN PROGRAMME WITH TWO SYMPHONIES

A Rejoicing Audience Besides—Mr. Fiedler Applies the Current Fashions with Beethoven's Music—Mahler's Example in Them—The Conductor's Own Particular Ways and Their Results—Some Random Comparisons

A SATIATED but cheerful cynic remarked at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon that probably there would not be another "all-Beethoven" programme at the Symphony Concerts until the orchestra celebrated, in March of 1927, the centenary of the composer's death. By that time, the cynic believed "the subsequent proceedings would interest him no more," and so he endured as best he might through Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, followed by Beethoven's symphony in A-major, No. 7, and followed yet again by Beethoven's symphony in C-minor, No. 5. The larger part of the audience, however, was of quite another mind. It filled the hall, as it usually does, even to the "rushed" places in the second balcony, which sometimes are not exhausted when there is no "soloist." It listened with such absorbed and undivided attention that scarcely a hat and the attendant pins and arms went up during the Finale of the Fifth Symphony. The applause, moreover, at the end of each piece and even in the pauses between the movements, was long, general and hearty. Twice at the end of the Seventh Symphony was Mr. Fiedler recalled and twice again at the end of the concert. Each time he had the orchestra or what remained of it—for it had already begun to disperse—on its feet, while he beamed happy and paternal, upon all and sundry. Surely Mr. Fiedler cannot complain of the length or the ardor of the leave-taking that his audiences on Friday afternoons have already begun. To signalize further his "all-Beethoven" programme and with two symphonies on it to boot, Mr. Fiedler conducted throughout from memory, and once, for the rarest of incidents with him, let the orchestra go its way through the repetitions of the Scherzo of the Seventh Symphony with hardly a beat from him. The conductor is seldom so trustful.

In all three pieces, Mr. Fiedler followed most of the current fashions with Beethoven's music and the methods he has usually chosen with it in the four years of his conductorship here. Mr. Mahler, it is to be feared, set too many of these current fashions. He was all for a very strenuous and emphatic Beethoven, who might have done this, that and the other, had he guessed a hundred years ago the dimensions of present concert-halls, the numbers of present orchestras and the present tendencies to make the most of every instrument therein. Mr. Mahler liked to hear the kettle-drums smitten, or as some said, thumped, through many a measure wherein Beethoven has used them. Mr. Fiedler yesterday was often like-minded. Mr. Mahler liked to hear the trumpets sounding shrilly above and through Beethoven's full-bodied and tumultuous Finales—liked to hear them scream, as again the resentful said. Mr. Fiedler was so minded, too, in the Finale of the Seventh Symphony, and he fairly pinched the piccolo to a shriek through the whirling Finale of the Fifth. Everyone—inclusive of Mr. Henry Holt, who recently found Beethoven old-fashioned—knows that he would have made fitter use of his wind choir had it been the instruments of our time. Unfortunately it did not, and so thoughtful conductors must do their best in 1912 to repair this oversight of fate. Accordingly, Mr. Fiedler, like Mr. Mahler, before him, sought often to emphasize the wood-winds—to open the orchestral mass for their significant entrances, to make their tone as incisive and characteristic as possible, to throw them vividly against the background of the shadowing or pulsing strings. In fine, the conductor missed hardly an opportunity "to play them up," as the phrase is. Yet the censorious will have it that Beethoven was not without his own ideas of the balance and the emphases in his tonal mass, and that it is becoming in conductors to respect them.

By so much the music of Beethoven ran in the current fashion yesterday afternoon, according to the original Mahleresque prescriptions. Now it is all very well to resent a devitalized Beethoven, such as Mr. Bachaus proffered his audience the other day in his playing of the "Emperor" concerto; but it is as easy to resent an over-vitalized Beethoven such as these pounding drum-beats, screaming trumpets and sharp-voiced wood winds suggested. Beethoven was undoubtedly a man of power, but, after all, he was no raging Roosevelt. Side by side with these current and relatively impersonal fashions went the peculiarly Fiedlerian ways that now after nearly four years, the discriminating part of his audiences has come to expect in his versions of Beethoven. That is to say the conductor labored incessantly and arduously with the music. He was never quite willing to let it run at its own obvious pace, as it were, and to its own clear rhythm, or to let it speak with its own unaided and eloquent voice. Yet some conductors have found this course the truer and the more revealing method with Beethoven and some that have reflected long and diligently upon his music have fused all their reflections into a seeming air of large and candid simplicity.

Mr. Fiedler must be always moulding a songful passage, until he has curved every phrase in it, until he has wrung the last drop out of it. In fact, he moulded the slow movement of the Fifth Symphony so assiduously that it became as another thing to what it seems to some of us on the engraved page. It was hard sometimes to recognize the reiterated phrase which sets the music in the memory or to hear the into many "effects"—moving, as it were, to its own beauty. Yet it is possible to fulfil Beethoven's inscription "Andante con Moto," and make the music the beautiful voice of a sad simplicity. Be it in the "Leonora" overture or in either of the symphonies, whenever opportunity offered or could be made, Mr. Fiedler would have his protracted and emphatic holds, his sharp contrasts, his restless modulations of pace and rhythm, his gusts of incisiveness and insistence at no very obvious suggestion of the music. As German scholars are prone to exhaust their subjects turning them incessantly in their hands, so Mr. Fiedler sometimes seems to be trying to exhaust Beethoven's music and to be ceaselessly "moulding" it.

Yet the conductor had his distinctive virtues with the two symphonies. Beethoven in them is master of the long progression wherein a musical thought beginning low-voiced and almost obscure, spreads through the orchestra, masters it and almost overwhelms it. Now Mr. Fiedler is very comprehending, skilful, eloquent in the marshalling of these thrilling advances. Again, he can be vivid and sensitive in some of his ordering of details as in the slow fall to the murmuring strings and the clucking bassoons of the Scherzo of the Fifth Symphony before the celebrated transition to the Finale begins. The big power that is in Mr. Fiedler sorts well with such tumultuous music as that of the beginning and the end of the Fifth Symphony, while his version of the Seventh Symphony was surely of the dance in the vehemence, if not always in the lightness, of his rhythms. Milton's hackneyed phrase about great poetry, that it should be simple, sensuous, impassioned, has its application to great music—such as Beethoven's—too. Mr. Fiedler is never quite willing to let it be all three unless he is conscientiously and laboriously trying to make it more so. And he has his inclinations to the rough and vehement Beethoven that Mr. Mahler conjured into his music rather than out of it. No doubt Beethoven could be a vehement, even a furious soul; but when he wrote, the restraints that make artistry more potent, rose instinctively in him.

High on the medallion in the centre of the gilded rectangle that frames the stage stood Beethoven's name. The wonder was that a bust of him had not been set for the occasion on the lintel behind the orchestra. By oversight, too, the programme-book forget to call him "the Shakspeare of music." Yet, as the overture and the two symphonies went their way, such thoughts now and then came as come before a succession of plays by the great Elizabethan. For three hundred years all sorts and conditions of men have sat before them and had their emotions of them. For a hundred years almost as many sorts of men have listened to the music of Beethoven and had their emotions of it. They have felt the bursting vitality of the plays and rejoiced in it. There is like bursting and gladdening vitality in the music. As they have thrilled to some big and sounding phrase in Shakspeare's verse, so they have answered as often to a like phrase in Beethoven's music. Often in the plays, in passages of sustained beauty, they have seemed to ride and this Seventh Symphony in their passage of sustained song they may seem to ride on the wings of music.

Are not Shakspeare's clowns romping and frolicking in what our later time would call a rough humor—somewhat akin to Beethoven's boisterous Scherzi? There are some of Beethoven's melodies that heard afresh fill the listener with an irresistible desire to sing them for himself, so seizing is the music of them. Who of us as a sensitive and eager lad has not read to himself a resounding or a ravishing passage in Shakspeare's verse and been seized straightway with a desire to read it aloud? The one in his verse, the other in his music commanded a magnificent rhetoric that the years may not dull or the centuries still, because there is a great human voice in it. They ranged—these two—as no other dramatist, as no other composer has ranged, through the passions, the griefs, the struggles, the mirths of men, feeling them, uttering them beautifully, roughly, brokenly, wildly, in tumults or in depths of emotion, but always with magnificence and power of word or tone. They—but the two symphonies, the concert and this article are done.

H. T. P.

JOURNAL

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

MAR 31 1912

MAX FIEDLER'S farewell appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, so far as Providence is concerned, will be at the fifth and last of the season's series in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening. Mr. Fiedler has been at the head of the orchestra for four seasons, and during that time has established himself as a conductor of more than ordinary popularity. Under him the organization has reached a degree of material prosperity which its managers attribute largely to his work. Next season Dr. Karl Muck, whom Mr. Fiedler succeeded, will return to the post of conductor.

The soloist next Tuesday will be Josef Hofmann, the pianist, whose engagements for the season have included three recitals, in Boston, New York and Chicago, in addition to his appearances with the Boston orchestra. He played here with the orchestra last season and is recognized as one of the chief of the season's soloists.

The programme which Mr. Fiedler announces includes no symphony. The first number will be Beethoven's Overture "Leonora" No. 3, which will be followed by Chopin's Concerto in F-Minor No. 2. The last three numbers will be Wagnerian—"A Faust Overture," a "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Tannhauser" Overture. The concert wil begin at 8:15 promptly.

[190]

From TIMES

Address New York

Date MAR 24 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S LAST PERFORMANCE

Mr. Fiedler, at His Last New York Appearance, Makes a Farewell Speech.

THE 'SYMPHONIA DOMESTICA'

Remarkable Playing of the Orchestra —The "Freischuetz" Overture and Wagner Selections.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its last appearance in New York in the present musical season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was also Mr. Fiedler's last appearance in this city, as his engagement as conductor of the orchestra is ended with the close of the season in Boston next month. The matinée audience realized this fact, and conspicuously gave expression to its feelings of regret at his departure and of gratitude for what he has done for the New York musical public in the four years that he has been at the head of the orchestra. As at the evening concert on Thursday, he was greeted with long continued applause when he appeared to take his place at the head of the orchestra; and at the close the listeners remained to applaud and to cheer for many minutes, recalling him again and again.

Finally Mr. Fiedler raised his hand for silence, and spoke in excellent English. He said that he could not "conduct his feelings" on that occasion so well as he could the orchestra, but he expressed his gratitude for the kindness that had been shown him in the four years during which he had been the director of the orchestra; said that had been four years of happiness for him, and hoped that the New York public would not forget him, as he would never forget the experiences he had had here, and closed with a heartfelt good-bye.

The tribute to him was sincere and was well deserved, for Mr. Fiedler has kept the high standards of the orchestra and has maintained not only its material prosperity in New York, which could not be grtater, but also the artistic value it has had to the most cultivated and fastidious music lovers of this city, and the place it has occupied in the very forefront of its musical activities.

The performance showed forth some of the greatest excellences of the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's direction, especially in Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which occupied the place of honor on the programme. There might be a difference of opinion as to the advisability, or necessity, of repeating this composition in New York, which Mr. Fiedler had already given here just two years ago, and for which he seems to cherish some affection. At all events, if the work is to be performed at all it had better be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; for only such a band of virtuosos could give it in such a marvelous technical perfection as that of yesterday's performance. No doubt many of the listeners thought that this technical perfection might better have been bestowed upon something else.

New York is now pretty well acquainted with the "Symphonia Domestica." It had its first performance here under the composer's direction, and has been heard several times since. It seemed, more than ever, yesterday a pretentious but an essentially commonplace and trivial composition. Strauss shows in it infinite dexterity, unlimited bagfuls of tricks, which cannot make up for its lack of distinction in ideas. The intention he had that it should be listened to "purely as music" and "without the distraction of following a train of thought exterior to the music," is preposterous. The work is through and through unmusical; it was composed, obviously, for the purpose of, and by means of, following a train of thought exterior to the music. Its themes have little musical beauty or significance in themselves, and when they are nearest having a musical value, are of a very commonplace character. They are for the most part devised for the purpose of yielding themselves readily to manipulation, to carry out the composer's wholly extra musical intention of using them in combinations and complexities that represent themselves to him as descriptive and narrative. As they do not, and can not, really possess of themselves any innate power of description or narration, the composition cannot be listened to understandingly without the programme, without a complete knowledge of the train of thought that prompted them. Of what value, "purely as music," for instance, are the seven strokes that twice occur? The programme makes it clear that the first seven represent the striking of the clock at bedtime, and that the second seven are emitted by the same faithful timepiece in the morning. They have at least so much significance to the anxious searcher who has been properly informed, but nothing more.

The composition not only gains nothing by repeated hearing; it loses. Passages that formerly seemed to posses beauty, as the slow section, now seem deplorably commonplace and cheaply sentimental, elaborate developments of ideas in themselves poor. As for the much vaunted skill in "counterpoint," by which Strauss unites so many disparate elements in the complicated web of his polyphony, not even the marvelously pellucid, precise, and subtly defined playing of the orchestra could make it seem other than a crass intermingling of anything in any way, without regard to its sound. "Counterpoint," as, thus exemplified, ceases to have any artistic value or musical significance.

The orchestra's playing of this composition, full of the most awkward and difficult passages, was wonderfully clear and flexible, and at every point secure. Mr. Fiedler had evidently wrought it out most completely, and with an art that conceded the difficulties that were overcome. There was applause; and the conductor again shared it with the men who had so skillfully seconded his intentions, by making them rise.

The programme also included Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," played with great dramatic power and without exaggerations in the modification of tempo and dynamics; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," an exquisite performance that brought refreshment after the labors of the "Symphonia Domestica"; the funeral music from "Götterdämmerung," in which the overpoweringly tragic effect of the music was not quite caught, and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from

EVENING NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

MAX FIEDLER MAKES HIS FAREWELL VISIT

Mme. Louise Homer Appears As Soloist With Boston Symphony.

There are few conductors of orchestras who combine all of the attributes which constitute perfection in their chosen musical offices. One of the most potent of these attributes is the selecting and arranging of programs, so that the successive works furnish adequate change of mood and style, maintaining interest and leaving the attentive listeners unwearied at the close of a performance. Some of our best conductors are unwise and unskillful program-makers.

In this art Max Fiedler has shown himself a master, for, although he has in a few instances presented works which failed to appeal strongly, he has never been guilty of tiresome compounds. He has indeed shown remarkable judgment and artistic feeling in his selections and in their order of succession. Mr. Fiedler, like all mortals, has his weaknesses and foibles; but it is becoming in this hour of parting to blot them from our memories, leaving the many pleasures he has afforded us in bolder relief.

Last evening's program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Lyric, was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72...Beethoven

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68...Brahms
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

"The Loreley"...Liszt
Prelude to "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Recitative and Aria of Lia, from "L'Enfant Prodigue"...Debussy
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24...Richard Strauss

The performance was a bit long, and would have been more effective without the Lohengrin prelude with its agonized violins. The Beethoven overture and the Brahm's Symphony, both of which were played by the New York Philharmonic on January 15, were very interestingly read.

Strauss' tone-poem "Death and Transfiguration," which marks the boundary, beyond which its author has since wandered into abnormal fields of musical thought, was made graphically descriptive. The subject of this tone-poem is so stupendous that Straus alone of living composers could have made it thrillingly interesting—that passage through dark honors and despair into light.

Mme. Homer was somewhat disappointing in the Liszt "Loreley," but she was superb in the recitative and aria from Debussy's l'Enfant Prodigue," which is a remarkable composition. It was written before its author had lost his respect for sustained melody, and sane harmonic adjustments.

O. B. B.

STANDARD UNION

MAR 23 1912

FIEDLER, PARTING, RECEIVES OVATION

Boston's Famous Orchestra Conductor Cheered on His Last Appearance Here.

"LEONORE" HIS GOOD-BYE.

Mme. Homer Soloist of an Interesting Concert.

Max Fiedler made his farewell appearance in Brooklyn as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of the Academy of Music last night. The occasion was a memorable one. The ovation extended to the retiring conductor when the audience, which filled every seat in the house rose to cheer him, was a spontaneous tribute to the artistic triumphs he has achieved during his four years in America. After the last strains of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture had closed the concert he was recalled time and again. Finally he made the whole orchestra rise to join him in response to the applause.

The programme presented was one of the most enjoyable the orchestra has given this season. It formed a fitting climax to a series of five concerts in which the conductor and players have maintained for the orchestra its eminent position as the leader in symphonic work. The most interesting number that Fiedler had selected was Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," about which such a storm of criticism raged when it was first heard in 1904 under the leadership of the composer. The rest of the programme showed catholicity of taste in its selection, and included, besides the numbers mentioned, compositions by Wagner, Liszt, Debussy and Weber.

The assisting artist was Mme. Homer. Her beautiful voice showed occasional traces of her recent indisposition, which prevented her appearance in Manhattan on Thursday, but her exquisite artistry saved her under trying circumstances. She was received enthusiastically.

At the close of the "Symphonia Domestica," A. Augustus Healy, president of the Institute board of trustees, came forward and, in a neat speech, conveyed to Dr. Fiedler the feeling of regret that has been general among the musical public at the announcement of his retirement. He recalled the work Fiedler had done since becoming leader of the Boston Symphony, how he advanced the prestige of the body, what keen sympathy existed among his men, himself and the public, what a loss his retirement meant, what great pleasure he had given to the people of Brooklyn, and how much his work had been appreciated.

The applause lasted for several minutes after Mr. Healy had spoken and Dr. Fiedler was showered with wreaths and flowers. The players joined in the cheering. Fiedler expressed his thanks in a simple speech and concluded:

"I will not say good-bye in so many words. I cannot quite express myself as I would like to. But I shall let the 'Leonore' overture say good-bye for me. It can do it so much better than I can."

The concert opened with the overture from "Der Freischutz" of Carl Maria von Weber. The selection is always a popular one and on a gala occasion like last night's the applause which followed its playing was even more enthusiastic than usual.

The "Symphonia Domestica" followed. This wonderful picture of "papa, mamma and the baby" with its realistic depiction of home life apparently leaves its hearers mystified no longer. People seems to have reached an understanding of Strauss' intention at last. The humor of the family quarrels on the violins, the breaking of dishes, the crying of the baby, appeared to be enjoyed at last. Then the themes of the mother's love for her child, the great conjugal love theme with its passionate climax and the joyous ending with its message of domestic bliss, made a deep impression. Strauss' symphony of new melodic thought was greeted with continued applause.

Mme. Homer sang Lizt's setting for Heine's poem, "Die Loreley." It is a sweet song, and the orchestral accompaniment, with its fantastic, fatalistic suggestions, made it doubly effective. The singer was not at her best in this number, but when she reappeared to sing Lia's recitative and aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy's cantata, which won for its composer in his youth the Prix de Rome, Mme. Homer's voice had warmed, and she sang with a richness of tone and color that have won for her the reputation of being America's leading contralto. The song is not at all characteristic of the later unconventional Debussy, but is a melody of considerable charm, and Mme. Homer sang it with fine taste.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," which contains the principal themes of the opera, "Siegfried," was excellently played. Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, completed the programme. It is doubtful if Fiedler could have found a number in which he could have said "Good-bye" more fittingly. It is an old friend, and its thrilling sweep and heart-breaking sadness always carry the audience to a rapturous state, especially when it is done as well as it was last night. Fiedler showed a great deal of fire and power in this number. At its conclusion the audience rose cheering. It was one of the most enthusiastic ovations given to a conductor in this city.

EVENING SUN

Baltimore, Md.

CONDUCTOR FIEDLER BIDS US FAREWELL

Last Boston Symphony Sees His Retirement. Mme. Homer Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, gave the final concert of the series at the Lyric last night, the occasion marking the farewell appearance of the director and also giving opportunity of enjoying the work of a favorite singer, Mme. Louise Homer, who was the soloist.

In selecting the program with which to bid adieu to his local admirers Mr. Fiedler chose numbers he had successfully presented before. His readings of the familiar "Leonora" overture, No. 3, of Beethoven, and of the symphony No. 1 in C minor, by Brahms, have been described in the past as being individual and somewhat sentimental, but the personality of the conductor was held in abeyance last night, and in consequence the interpretations gained interest.

To prevent so long a composition as the Brahms symphony from becoming tedious is a task that leads directors to assume that touches of an emotional kind are needed. Mr. Stransky recently read this work at a local concert with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. To those who held recollections of his interpretation, there was a chance last night to weigh it with Mr. Fiedler's stalwart efforts. Both conductors displayed a desire to cover up the academic character of Brahms' writing.

The refined manner in which the well-known prelude to "Lohengrin" was played gave an example of the high state of efficiency of the orchestra, and in reading this number the retiring conductor manifested a control which evoked the proper mood effectively. In the "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, Mr. Fiedler gave a fine performance, and the repetition of the work found us listening with greater absorption, and it must also be said, with a broader admiration for the interpreter. In this expressive tone-poem, the program, which Strauss has outlined, easily reaches the hearer.

Mme. Louise Homer, of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, was given a friendly reception as she appeared upon the stage, and her singing afforded real delight. She presented Liszt's "The Loreley," and delivered a recitative and aria from Debussey's "L'Enfant Prodigue." Her tone is radiant, fresh and rich in quality, while the timber of her voice is at all times pleasant. The dramatic element is present in a convincing manner, and whether it be in the expressive low register or in the higher compass, each tone is made to carry musical significance. This careful manipulation of the voice, combined with serious musicianship, makes Mme. Homer an artist who is capable of giving enjoyment on the concert stage as well as in opera. Her efforts were applauded to the utmost, and a feeling of entire satisfaction prevailed.

At the close of the concert there was a bit of farewell applause for Mr. Fiedler, but its amount could scarcely be termed demonstrative. He has given us much that has deserved praise, and if opinions have varied at times as to the effectiveness of his efforts, it remains to be stated that his energy and enthusiasm have been always well meant. Therefore, as he leaves, let thanks be extended to him for the evening of genuine musical entertainment he has given us.

F. C. B.

Address ...

PROVIDENCE R I

Date ... DEC 9 - 1912

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last of Season, and Farewell Appearance of Conductor Fiedler.

The fifth and last concert for the present season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night in Infantry Hall. The occasion was a notable one for the reason that it was the last appearance here as conductor of the orchestra of Mr. Max Fiedler, whose four years of leadership have been eminently successful and won him a host of friends and admirers. The soloist was the brilliant young pianist, Mr. Josef Hofmann, and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72...Beethoven
Concerto No. 2, F minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 21 ...Ch
I. Maestoso.
II. Larghetto.
III. Allegro vivace.
A "Faust" Overture ...Wa
"A Siegfried Idyl" ...Wa
Overture, "Tannhauser" ...Wa

In the more than 30 years since organization the Boston orchestra had six conductors. But one of th has been honored with a recall—Mr. W helm Gericke—though the number will increased to two when Dr. Karl Muc returns next fall. All the men who hav filled this responsible and exacting pos however, have been able—naturally so, a they have been chosen with great care and because of established reputation. Naturally, too, though all good musicians and conductors, the measure of their success has not been exactly equal. Notwithstanding the conspicuous brilliancy of one or two, however, it is not too much to say that the all-around excellence of Mr. Fiedler's work entitles him to be called one of the best leaders the orchestra has ever had.

As a maker of programmes, indeed, he has really excelled all others—and that is a very important part of a conductor's work. His taste is catholic; he appreciates both the classics and the newer school of composers; and his programmes have always been fresh, interesting and symmetrical. As a leader his interpretations are almost always both sane and inspiring, and he has kept the orchestra up sharply to its highest standard of performance. The natural regret over his coming departure would be even deeper than it is were his successor to be any other than Dr. Muck. It is a pleasure to pay this deserved tribute, and last night's audience was evidently of the same mind, for he was paid the compliment of a full house on a most disagreeable evening, and was given a rousing ovation both at the beginning and end of the concert.

The programme was commonplace—for one of Mr. Fiedler's making—and contained nothing unfamiliar; but it was splendidly played and roundly applauded. There was no symphony, the piano concerto standing as the principal number of the programme. In choosing Chopin's F minor concerto Mr. Hofmann elected to play one of the most interesting and agreeable works of that character. It is a beautiful work in itself, and affords the soloist a fine opportunity to display his gifts. That Mr. Hofmann should have played it with conspicuous brilliancy and delicacy, as well as with masterful musicianship, was no more than was to be expected. His performance, in which he received most sympathetic support from Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra, was warm and deserved recognition.

W. A. P.

EVENING GLOBE,

New York City.

MAR 25 1912

Fiedler Bids a Last Farewell to New York

Hearty Applause for Retiring Boston Conductor on Occasion of His Last New York Concert—Other News of the Music World.

TO-DAY.

Carnegie Hall—8.15 P. M., first Brahms Festival concert.

Metropolitan Opera House—7.30 P. M., "Die Meistersinger."

TO-MORROW.

Carnegie Hall—8.15 P. M., concert of the Volpe Symphony Society.

Metropolitan Opera House—8 P. M., "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci."

Max Fiedler conducted his last concert here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The audience crowded the hall to its utmost capacity, and as on Thursday night the applause for Mr. Fiedler was loud and long. At the last Mr. Fiedler spoke a few words of farewell in excellent English.

The programme consisted of the overture to "Der Freischütz," Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," and three Wagner numbers—the "Siegfried Idyl," the funeral music from "Götterdämmerung," and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde." In view of the nature of the occasion it is enough to say that the performance of the orchestra throughout was of a very high order. Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" Mr. Fiedler had conducted here almost exactly two years earlier. Most listeners, however they regard Strauss's music in general, will probably agree that the "Symphonia Domestica" is inferior to several of his large orchestral works. And yet it is hard to see how any one can deny the great beauty of many pages, especially when so sympathetically set forth as by Mr. Fiedler.

Next season Dr. Muck returns to the head of the Boston orchestra and Mr. Fiedler presumably returns to Germany. The latter fact is to be sincerely regretted, for with symphony orchestras the country over America needs a man like Max Fiedler. He is unquestionably a far better conductor to-day than when he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra three and a half years ago. If then he seemed hardly up to the requirements of the great orchestra he was called on to lead, he has grown with opportunity. Many performances under his leadership—notably of the compositions of Richard Strauss and that of Brahms's C minor symphony last Thursday—will be treasured in the memory of all who heard them and furnish standards by which other men will be judged. Moreover, Mr. Fiedler will turn over to Dr. Muck the same orchestra of astonishing virtuosity that he received from him. Let us hope Mr. Fiedler's farewell to America is only temporary.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date MAR 22 1912

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Great Enthusiasm at Last of Evening Concerts This Season.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, on its last visit of the season to New York, gave the first of its two concerts last evening in Carnegie hall. At these concerts Mr. Fiedler makes his last appearances here as conductor of the orchestra, as his engagement in Boston ends with the present season. The fact was recognized by the audience last evening, which gave Mr. Fiedler long and enthusiastic applause as he came upon the platform. It had occasion through the evening to renew this enthusiasm repeatedly, for the performance, both Mr. Fiedler's part in it and that of his men, was of such magnificence as this wonderful organization has rarely given in all the glorious years of its history. There was a renewed demonstration in his honor at the close of the concert, and he was made to feel the esteem in which he is held here, says the New York Times.

There was a disappointment in store for the audience, who found in their programs, as they entered the hall, a printed slip announcing that Mme. Homer, who was to be the soloist, and sing Liszt's song, "Die Lorelei," and Lia's recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," was unable to sing on account of a severe cold. The loss was made up by the orchestra itself; it added to the program, which, as originally arranged, contained two preludes of Wagner's—those to "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser"—a third, that to "Die Meistersinger." And the orchestra was not a bad substitute.

The program began with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, and the symphony was the first of the Brahms. The overture was given this occasion for the sixth time this season, and the symphony for the fourth time, and another performance of each is coming before the end of the season. But there were no complaints, for the orchestra played both with an unequaled splendor. In Brahms's symphony, indeed, it seemed as if Mr. Fiedler and his men were inspired by the marvelous eloquence of the music. Such a performance, indeed, was a new revelation of it, and was as cogent an answer as could possibly be made to the oft-repeated charge that Brahms's instrumentation is thick, muddy, and generally disagreeable. Played with such clarity, such tonal beauty, such perfect distribution of balance between all the instrumental voices, the composer's real intentions are brought to a consummate realization, and they are disclosed as the necessary and appropriate embodiment of the musical ideas of the work.

Mr. Fiedler's reading was marked by the drastic energy, the poetry, the romantic fire that characterize the movements of this work. It was full of exquisite nuances, of finished phrasing, and more than all, in these movements he showed forth their plastic beauty of form, their symmetry and proportion, their magnificent climaxes. It was a performance of unequaled splendor.

[181]

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address New York

Date

DR. MAX FIEDLER SAYS FAREWELL

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Brief Speech at Last Concert.

RECEIVES A WARM TRIBUTE

Programme, Which Includes Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," of the Usual High Order.

There was a slightly emotional tinge to the concert given yesterday at Carnegie Hall. It was the last of this season. It was also the farewell of Dr. Max Fiedler, who has conducted Major Higginson's admirable association of "symphoniac" men, as Plutarch would have called them, for four years. Dr. Fiedler during that lapse of time has earned golden opinions, and in New York a firm and general popularity. His musicianship has never been questioned. He has shown also that he has ardor and enthusiasm. His individuality is emphatic without being obtrusive. His programmes have not been tainted with faddism or narrow personal preferences. So when he bade good-by as he did, he was the recipient of a warm and unusual tribute.

He was actually forced to make a speech. To the ordinary reader this may seem the most natural thing in all the world. At the Boston Symphony concerts it is far from ordinary. Those concerts are stately expositions of the classics—the term is used in its aesthetic and not its technical significance in music. They are attended by those who take their music seriously, by austere students and satisfied critics. At a Boston Symphony concert you say little, think much and subscribe for next year. The audience which seems to include every New Englander in New York, is senatorial in its dignity, wearing its heart not upon its sleeve, but safe from the obtrusion of the vulgar, firmly beneath its waistcoat.

And yet yesterday it became emotional. When the last strains of the prelude and Liebestod had died away applause for Dr. Fiedler became continued and insistent. One part was clapping, a minority was shouting and a few were lachrymose. Again and again the sturdy, Teutonic, and yet fiery and vivacious figure of the retiring director bowed its acknowledgement of the applause. When he had been called for the tenth time, and the personnel of the orchestra had dispersed itself in the direction of various diversories, Dr. Fiedler mounted the conductor's platform and made a speech.

"Ladies and gent'emen," said he, "I am far better able to express myself by means of orchestral means (pointing to the now empty desks) than in ordinary language. I have been conducting here now for four years and the evenings and afternoons I have spent in this hall have been occasions of happiness to me. May I say that from the first they seem to have been greeted on your part with signs of increasing favor? And in bidding good-by I only ask that you do not forget me too soon."

This little discourse, delivered in good and ready English, was loudly cheered.

The programme which preceded these sadnesses of farewell consisted of the "Sinfonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, and the Siegfried Idyll, the Trauermarsch from "Goetterdaemerung" and the Prelude and Liebestod already mentioned. These were all played with exquisite finish and poetical feeling and do not call for any prolonged analysis.

Let the conclusion of this article contain words of solace to the many admirers of Dr. Fiedler. He will probably return, even after many days. The Boston Symphony Society has been in existence thirty years. None of its conductors has ever died yet. Each of them has come back in some form or other. Even Georg Henschel, one of its pious founders, is to be here next Summer, and Nikisch will be here next month.

From PRESS

Address New York

Date 1912

"SYMPHONICA DOMESTICA" IS READ VIVIDLY BY FIELDER

Makes Strauss's Tone-Poem His Parting Gift for the Season.

PLAYED WITH GREAT ELOQUENCE

Other Selections on Programme Are Interpreted with Less Poetic Technique.

For his principal parting gift to New Yorkers Max Fiedler presented yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert this season in New York, Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," the last symphonic work of the great German comopser before he began to devote his powers to lyric drama. This extraordinary composition inspired by moods awakened in the intimacy of the family circle is peculiarly associated with America, for it was in Carnegie Hall on March 21, 1904, under the composer's own direction, that the huge tone-poem had its first production anywhere, Germany being compelled to wait until June 1 of the same year before it could express approval.

After the New York premiere, it may be recalled, a great deal of wit and humor was lavished on descriptions of the score, the underlying domestic subject supplying abundant opportunity for those who were inclined to treat it with levity. Musically, however, the "Symphonia Domestica" has stood the test of repetition exceedingly well, and it would not be at all surprising if the work eventually should win wider approval than any of Strauss's other orchestral creations. A point distinctly in its favor is the extraordinary melodiousness of the score; for that quality hardly can escape the untrained ear, once it has grown accustomed to the composer's individual and original intervals, even though the extraordinary finesse and limpid transparency of the instrumentation fail to attract the immediate attention of the average listener.

The themes not only have rhythmical character and vitality, they have striking melodic physiognomy and emotional significance; they have intrinsic lyric value; they do not create the impression of being carefully measured building stones lesigned to fit into a complicated musical structure.

And what wonderful polyphonic use the composer has made of those themes; how exquisitely, with what superb eloquence, he has woven them into his elaborate fabric. Never, even in the midst of the most striking contrapuntal bravura, the most subtle melodic weavery, is the impression that of artificiality, of mere cerebral virtuosity. With extraordinary freedom and fluency the curves, angles and lines join, interlock, meet or merge, always artistically, always plastically, always beautifully—at least to the initiated ear—despite moments of mordant and intentionally grinding harmonic friction.

Truly a great work is the "Symphonia Domestica," perhaps the greatest symphonic composition thus far of the twentieth century, certainly the most exalted example of modern polyphony; and it received yesterday at the hands of Fiedler and his men an interpretation which not only set forth the musical content of the score with amazing clarity, but wrung from it the last drop of melodious beauty. So marvelously mellifluous and euphonious, indeed, was the performance that even the passages of deliberate cacophony—cacophony, however, it must be emphasied, which is invariably pregnant with significance—lost much of its harshness, though retaining its spice. More rhythmical incisiveness and sharpness only, more perfect unanimity and precision in attack, would have been needed to make the performance well-nigh ideal.

Not quite so satisfying were the other contributions on the programme. Of the "Freischuetz" overture, to be sure, which opened the matinee, Fiedler gave a vivid and picturesque reading. More delicate, more poetic and technically more finished interpretations of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," however; tragically more poignant productions of the funereal music from "Goetterdaemmerung" and emotionally more inspired performances of the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde" certainly have been heard in New York than those given yesterday.

Still, the "Symphonia Domestica," looming high among the artistic achievements of the season, represented an impressive farewell offering and Max Fiedler hardly could have left pleasanter memories at parting than he did through the medium of Strauss's genius. He and his orchestra were greeted with tributes of applause far more bounteous than matinee audiences usually dispense.

At the end of the afternoon Fiedler was recalled so many times that he finally was moved to make a speech, much to the surprise and the delight of the crowd. "I would like to say what is in my heart," the conductor began in good English, "but I can't conduct my feelings as well as my dear orchestra. It is hard for me to express my gratitude and appreciation for the reception you have given me and for your kindness, sympathy and encouragement. The nights I have passed in New York long will remain in my memory, and all I ask is that you will not forget me too quickly.

M. S.

SUN

New York

MAR 24 1912

CONDUCTOR FIEDLER BIDS US GOOD-BY

His Farewell Appearance Made at Last Matinee Concert of the Boston Orchestra.

STRAUSS'S DOMESTIC POEM

That and Some Wagner and Weber the Final Song of the Bostonians.

Max Fiedler, conductor, bade farewell to New York yesterday. It was at the last matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall and the audience was so large that many wouldbe hearers of the entertainment were unable to gain admission to the hall. Mr. Fiedler came to New York as one of the visiting conductors of the Philharmonic Society toward the end of the season of 1905-06. He returned as conductor of the Boston orchestra on November 5, 1908.

On that occasion it was disclosed that Mr. Fiedler's style was a combination of the results of academic study with rude strength. The forcing of middle voices in a Brahms symphony accentuated those traits of the composer's instrumentation which have been most often set down to his discredit. Overdevelopment of contratsts, opacity in the strings and heavy blowing in the brass were all deplored.

In the four seasons of his conductorship Mr. Fiedler has outgrown most of his undesirable peculiartities, while he has retained his force and his acumen. His conducting has found continually increasing favor and that means that it has deserved it, for in the long run the musical public of this town is not to be deceived.

Mr. Fiedler retires to give way to the conductor whom he succeeded, Dr. Carl Nuck of Berlin. Once again the United States is under the regrettable necessity of robbing the Kaiser of one of his favorite musical entertainers. Doubtless the German empire will survive the loss, especially as we are sending back to it a greatly grown Fiedler. New York has enjoyed much good music under Mr. Fiedler's direction and will part with him with sorrow. And it will bless him in that he has left his matchless instrument beind him unimpaired.

The programme offered yesterday was one of liberal proportions. It comprised Weber's "Freischütz" overture, Richard Strauss's tone poem called "Symphonia Domestica" and three Wagner numbers, the "Siegfried Idyl," the funeral march from "Götterdämmerung" and the prelude and "liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde." It seems hardly worth while to embark upon a philosophical consideration of this music.

The Strauss "Symphonia Domestica" was last played here just two years ago on March 24 by the same orchestra. It has not become any greater in the meantime and still seems most aptly described by the dictum of Ernest Newman, "the work of a clever man who was once a genius." As a piece of orchestral construction it shows all the skill of Strauss, but as a poetic inspiration it falls short of all his others.

Perhaps there were too many distracting circumstances. The peace of the domestic fireside was disturbed by the presence of mamma and the baby. If Mr. Strauss had been at home alone big things might have eventuated. But—needles and pins, when a man's married his trouble begins. There are altogether too few echoes here of "A Hero's Life." But it was splendidly played. The audience was very kind and sat in rapt attention, even when the blessed baby was spanked and put to bed.

APRIL 27, 1912

TRAVELER, MARCH 16, 1912.

LAST CECILIA CONCERT.

The second and last Cecilia concert of the year will be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock Dr. Mees has arranged a programme composed chiefly of "a cappella" pieces, and C. A. Ellis who has undertaken the direction of these concerts this year, has been able to engage as soloists, Madame Alma Gluck, soprano, and Leo Slezak, tenor, both of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York City. These artists were engaged to take the places of Madame Emma Eames and Emilio de Gorgorza who had been engaged for this concert but cancelled the engagement in order to return to Europe on account of Madame Eames' illness.

Madame Gluck has been heard here a number of times, her last appearance having been at the first of the Symphony concerts of this year. Few singers have made a more favorable impression. As for Mr. Slezak, he is one of the greatest heroic tenors of today.

Madame Gluck will sing: Rameau's "Rossignols Amoureux," Schindler's "La Colomba" and Mozart's "Warnung," also Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Song of the Shepherd Lehl," and "Chant Hindu." Paladilhe's "Psyche" and Thayer's "My Laddie." Mr. Slezak will sing: Hermann's "Salomo," Wolf's "Versenwiegene Liebe," Liszt's "Die Lorelei," Woodman's "Ashes of Roses," and Rummel's "Ecstasy," also Goldmark's "Assad's Narative from 'The Queen of Sheba.'"

MISS ALMA GLUCK CECILIA SOCIETY SYMPHONY HALL MAR 21

LEO SLEZAK SYMPHONY HALL MAR. 21

MONITOR,

Mr. Fiedler's last Symphony program, which will be Friday afternoon, May 4, and Saturday evening, May 5, is made up entirely of well-tried favorites. The first part will comprise the "Oberon" overture of Weber and the C-minor Symphony of Brahms. The second part is devoted to Wagner, the selections being the prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler sail from New York on May 11 on the Prinz Friedrich

[182]

From TRIBUNE

Address New York

Date MAR 24 1912

MAX FIEDLER'S FAREWELL

Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra Here for Last Time.

Yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was the last of this season's New York series, but it possessed beyond this another and a deeper interest, in that is marked the farewell to this city of Max Fiedler, who for the last four years has led the organization worthily and well. Mr. Fiedler has by his admirable musicianship, his sincere and well balanced feeling for the best in the musical art, his authority in command, won a warm and well deserved place in the hearts of true music lovers, not only in the Massachusetts capital, but in this city as well.

The ever increasing size of the audiences that have greeted him in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's too few visits to Carnegie Hall has borne abundant testimony to the esteem in which his leadership has been held. Yesterday afternoon's audience was a huge one, one that was limited only by the capacity of the hall and one that by its enthusiasm gave Mr. Fiedler to understand how it appreciated him. At the end of the concert in a few well chosen words he thanked the New York public for the warm manner in which it had always received him, and assured them that he regretted exceedingly being forced to leave America.

Mr. Fiedler chose for his pièce de résistance Richard Strauss's "Domestic Symphony," a work heard but seldom in this city. This symphony, one of the most characteristic of Straussian compositions, is none too easy of execution, but the great band gave of it an interpretation that made its very dissonances quite bearable, and of its melodies a memory to be dreamed of. Never had the orchestra been more united in execution, never had its dynamics been more perfectly adjusted, or its tone richer or more resonant. In fact, its work quite exhausted superlatives.

The second half of the programme was devoted to Wagner, with the "Siegfried Idyl," the Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung" and the "Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod. In all of these Mr. Fiedler's understanding of the Wagnerian spirit was most manifest, and in the Funeral Music was in particular proclaimed in all its majesty and tragic power. In this and in the Liebestod he sang his farewell to New York, and sang it in a manner not soon to be forgotten. At the end of the concert, after enthusiastic applause, Mr. Fiedler said:

"I thank you for the kindness you have shown me. The nights I have spent in New York are among the happiest of my life. I can conduct this magnificent orchestra better than I can show my feelings. I only ask that you do not forget me too qui[illegible]"

EVE. POST.

ess New York City.

MAR 5

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Max Fiedler's Farewell.

No soloist graced the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon—its last concert of the season, by the way—but there was as large an audience in Carnegie Hall as though some world-famous singer, pianist, or violinist were appearing. The conductor, Max Fiedler, came in for more than his usual share of attention, inasmuch as the occasion marked his last appearance in New York at the head of the Boston Orchestra. The house greeted him uproariously before the concert started, and he was kept busy bowing for several minutes before he could begin. There was a good deal of enthusiasm throughout the afternoon, and at the close the audience recalled him again and again until he made a little speech of thanks.

Mr. Fiedler's farewell programme was excellently chosen, save in one instance. The position of honor was occupied by Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." Was this because the conductor wanted once more to impress his hearers with the technical virtuosity of the Boston players? That is quite unnecessary at this date. Naturally the piece was splendidly played, but three quarters of an hour of a thing that contains just about ten minutes of real musical beauty is too much of an endurance test. The worst of all is that this music has lost most of its power to amaze and startle by its harmonic audacities and orchestral color. That is the fundamental trouble with nine-tenths of Strauss's work. As soon as it ceases to astonish by its "revolutionary" qualities it withers and stales.

The "Symphonia Domestica" was followed by a "sinfonietta domestica"—Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll"—as full of original beauty, and genuine emotion as the "Symphonia" is devoid of them. It cannot be that Mr. Fiedler brought out all the fable tenderness that it contains. Neither the "Götterdämmerung" funeral music which came next, did he bring out the measure of heroic grandeur. The concert closed with a fine performance of the "Tristan" prelude and "Liebestod."

TIMES

New York

APR 7 - 1912

An Excellent Scheme by Which It Is Hoped to Put the Philharmonic Society On a Secure Financial Basis.

THE Philharmonic Society issues an appeal for public support to carry out its new form of organization, adopted that it may accept the late Joseph Pulitzer's bequest of $500,000, and also "the eventual reversion of another sum, which may prove to be as large." This latter is interesting, and further developments of it will be eagerly awaited. Mr. Pulitzer stipulated in his will that the society should become a "membership corporation," with at least a thousand members paying dues. The society now invites such members, on conditions similar to those established by the Metropolitan Museum and the Museum of Natural History.

It is much to be hoped that the scheme as outlined may be successfully realized and that the society may be put on a secure financial basis thereby. The device is a new one, so far as it is applied to an orchestra such as the Philharmonic Society. There may be difficulties encountered. It may strike the public that there are differences between a museum and an orchestra. But the plan upon which the Philharmonic Society has been carried on for the last three seasons has been avowedly only a temporary one; necessarily so, from its nature. Mr. Pulitzer's bequest came with a suggestion for another and more permanent arrangement, and the people in charge of the society's affairs have adopted it, no doubt after mature consideration and with good reasons for expecting success.

Under this provisional plan a guarantee fund of $100,000 a year has been pledged by certain public-spirited and generous music lovers. The reorganization of the society and its concerts for these three seasons have been very expensive indeed. The Directors have not taken the public into their confidence as to their finances; but if the rumors that have gained currency are only measurably true, the pecuniary results have been such as might well dismay less energetic and optimistic heads. They have probably involved a greater cost than any similar organization in the world ever had to meet.

The arrangements made by and with Mr. Mahler three years ago were upon an exceedingly liberal, not to say extravagant scale. He received a very large salary, and had very expansive ideas as to the duties of the wealthy people of New York in bestowing their money upon the organization of which he was the head. The new arrangements with Mr. Stransky are more reasonable, and the improved conditions that were expected under them have evidently been in large measure attained. All of which gives grounds for encouragement to the society's friends.

It is encouraging, for instance, to learn that there is so large an increase in the receipts as 40 per cent. over the first season of the present arrangement, with an increase of the expenses of only 10 per cent., while the concerts given have nearly doubled in number. This would seem to indicate a firmer grasp and a greater control over the situation. Also, what is even more important, a greater public interest and support. The deficit is far from being overcome, and of course the only hope is to get it down to proportions such that the interest on the Pulitzer bequest and the hoped-for assistance of the subscribing members shall cover it.

Though a deficit in the annual budget of the Philharmonic Society is inevitable, such a one as has lately resulted ought not by any means to be the average from the work of any orchestra that is really successful in meeting the public desires and needs.

But even if the plans at present proposed are such as will result in controlling the financial situation, there are still diffculties and dangers that even such a result will not succeed wholly in obviating. As was pointed out in THE TIMES last Autumn, when the news of Mr. Pulitzer's bequest first became known, these difficulties and dangers are almost inseparable from the control of such an enterprise by a committee of laymen and women. Public spirit and a desire to aid in the cause of music are not all that are needed. In considering the problems of carrying on an orchestra the mind almost instinctively reverts to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the finest exemplar of such an organization, not only in its musical results, but also in the manner of its management.

Major Henry L. Higginson's investment in the orchestra, which is his creation, has been much more than the money it has cost him. It has included the application for thirty years of his time, thought, wisdom, tact, judgment, and patience; the knowledge of what to do and what not to do. In other words, it has taken a considerable share of the ability of a man whose conspicuous skill in the conduct of large affairs and the management of men has been joined to a fine and cultivated taste and a passion for music.

And not a small part of his tact and judgment has consisted in the fact that, notwithstanding his taste and passion for music and the intense interest which a real proprietorship must have given him, he has steadily kept his hands off the artistic control of his enterprise and has given his conductors full responsibility and, to the utmost extent possible, full control. He has never even constituted himself a "programme committee."

This has not relieved him of the burdens and anxieties of owning a great and delicately organized instrument. "What the Boston Symphony Orchestra has cost him in time and trouble, in annoyances great and small, in perplexities, in demands upon his patience, wisdom, and sense of justice, no man may know," was written of him a few years ago—and written upon authority.

The disinterested and public-spirited men and women who have worked so hard and done so much for the Philharmonic Society in the last three seasons have no doubt had similar experiences of their own in greater or less degree. It seems inevitable that there should be greater expense and trouble in New York than in Boston even in the attainment of results not yet comparable with those of the Boston Orchestra. There is the great problem of the union to deal with. There are difficulties in securing the men wanted for certain positions—difficulties which the union is avowedly established to promote. There are all sorts of artistic hindrances that will hamper the conductor in his work. There are undercurrents of one sort or another, real or imagined.

But even if the difficulties were no greater, it would probably be found that no committee, however devoted, could achieve such results as exactly the right Maecenas in the right place, such as Major Higginson has been. It does not seem possible under present conditions that such a one will be found for the Philharmonic Society. But something of the same sort of thing that Major Higginson has given to his orchestra must be given to the Philharmonic Society, besides the money that comes to it, if it is to gain a similar standing. In the meantime there will be a sincere hope that the thousand subscribing members needed will come forward; that the public will give a generous response to the appeal for the support of an institution of whose history and achievements New York may well be proud; and that Mr. Stransky will be afforded all the backing needed for his efforts to raise the Philharmonic Society to the artistic level that New York has a right to expect its oldest and most famous musical organization to reach. RICHARD ALDRICH.

Last Sunday some statistics of performances of American compositions by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Max Fiedler were printed in this place. They were furnished by the professional statistician of the orchestra. They have moved George W. Chadwick, head of the New England Conservatory and one of the most distinguished of American composers to write to the music critic of THE SUN as follows:

"The records show that Converse's 'Ormazd' was first performed by the St. Louis orchestra; that Hadley's 'Culprit Fay' was first played in Grand Rapids by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra; that my suite first came to hearing in Philadelphia, and that all the other pieces by me were performed before they were heard at the Boston Symphony concerts. Besides, Hadley's 'Salome' has been played eighteen times, Converse's 'Mystic Trumpeter' eight or ten and my suite five times since last April. All of which hardly seems to justify your remark about a 'second time.'"

Of course the writer of this department of THE SUN has no excuse to offer except that, in spite of his years of experience, he once again ate of the fruit with which the press agent did tempt him. It is a singular and interesting fact that as soon as a man becomes a press agent he buries his conscience. And the press agent of the Boston orchestra seems to be such a nice young man too.

W. J. H.

From HERALD

Address New York

Date MAR 24 191

Mr. Fiedler Bids Goodby to New York

"Don't Forget Me Too Soon," Asks Conductor of Boston Symphony After Farewell Concert.

Conducting his last New York concert and adding a farewell speech at the close was Mr. Max Fielder's programme yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, when the final concert of the season here was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As already announced, Mr. Fiedler leaves his post as conductor at the close of the Boston season. When he appeared yesterday he was greeted by prolonged applause, and after the concert he was recalled repeatedly, the audience remaining standing, applauding and cheering him. He finally said:—

"I cannot conduct my feelings as well as I can conduct this wonderful orchestra, but I simply can tell you that the concerts I have led here will long remain in my memory as happy times. I thank you for your sympathy and support during my four years' stay in this country, and I only say:—Don't forget me too soon. I am very unhappy to leave you."

There was a final round of applause and New York concert patrons had taken leave of Mr. Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck will be the next leader of the Boston Orchestra.

The goodby concert was a delightful one. The chief number was Dr. Richard Strauss' "Sinphonia Domestica," a well known work, revealing a day and a night in a family circle, the themes depicting father, mother and baby and their doings. It was wonderfully played, its monumental difficulties being tossed off as if they were mere nothings. Mr. Fiedler gave it a temperamental reading.

Weber's "Freischuetz" overture was admirably played, as were three Wagner excerpts, "Siegfried" Idyl, funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung" and prelude and finale from "Tristan und Isolde."

From Sun

Address Pittsburg, Pa.

Date APR 4 1912

FINAL CONCERT OF SERIES IS GIVEN

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Alwin Schroeder, Soloist, Please Large Audienec With Good Program.

The series of five concerts arranged for the season of 1911-12 by the Pittsburgh Orchestra association was brought to an eventful and artistic close in the Soldiers' Memorial last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cello soloist. The occasion marked the farewell appearance in this city of Mr. Fiedler for he is retiring as conductor of this splendid orchestra. There was a large audience present and the retiring conductor was tendered an ovation.

For variety and excelelnce the program could hardly have been improved upon. The big piece of the evening was the "Unfinished Symphony," by Schubert, which was given in the first part of the program. It has been heard many times before by Pittsburgh audiences, but it has never been heard to better advantage than was the cast last night.

The beautiful first movement was given an almost perfect reading and a storm of applause greeted the conductor and his players when it was finished. Mr. Fiedler exercised his powers of imagination in his interpretation and the result was beautiful. The second movement was also beautifully played. The opening number, which made up the rest of the first part of the program, was the Beethoven "Egmont" overture. Its rendition was irpressive and pleased the audience.

The soloist, Mr. Schroeder, opened the second half of the program with "Variations of a Roooco Theme," by Tschaikowsky Mr. Schroeder's appearance on the stage was the signal for loud and prolonged applause. He had not played a note, but the confidence of the audience in his ability was expressed by this demonstration. By his playing he showed that he was deserving of the enthusiastic reception he had been given. His number was beautiful throughout and he was recalled time and again, but he refused to give an encore. The Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and two Wagner numbers, the "Lohengrin Prelude," and the "Tannhauser" overture, completed the program. They were both well given.

It was announced in the program that the association will continue its present policy of giving concerts by outside organizations next season.

W.

[183]

HERALD,

APRIL 10, 1912.

NIKISCH IS HERE AFTER 19 YEARS

London Orchestra Warmly Greeted by Boston Audience.

By PHILIP HALE.

The London Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Nikisch, made its first appearance in Boston last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture "Leonora" No. 3; Brahms, Symphony in C minor, No. 1; Tschaikowsky, "Francesca da Rimini"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The praise of this orchestra has been trumpeted with no uncertain blasts. We have all been told that it is "the finest orchestra in the world." And thus the zeal of the advance agent, but not according to knowledge, kindled unreasonable expectation in the breasts of the unwary.

The strings are numerically and technically strong and brilliant, but the brilliance is that of hard polish. In cantabile passages the violins, violas and 'cellos are without sensuousness. The wood-wind section is of inferior quality. The first oboe bites as aqua fortis. The flute tone is peculiar and neither mellow nor of sparkling clearness. The clarinets are perhaps a little better. The brass is in no way remarkable; on the contrary the horns were uncertain last night, and thrumpets and trombones were often coarse and blatant.

On the other hand, the orchestra as a whole is singularly plastic, and Mr. Nikisch played upon it as upon a single instrument. It followed, it seemed to anticipate, his wishes. It breathed with him. Its performance was spontaneous and vivid. Its sonorousness was at times overwhelming. But in homogeneity and euphony this orchestra is surpassed by orchestras that do not make so great pretensions. It is not necessary to refer to the Boston Symphony orchestra, nor would it be in good taste to draw an elaborate comparison between the local and the visiting orchestras. It is enough to say that the London Symphony orchestra, in spite of its evidently great routine experience and highly respectable proficiency in matters of technic, is inferior to the Theodore Thomas orchestra of Chicago, nor is it superior, if equal, to the Philharmonic Society of New York in its best estate.

It was in April, 1893, that Mr. Nikisch conducted in Boston for the last time before leaving this city to go to Budapest. During the 19 years of his absence he has gained a great reputation as a virtuoso conductor. As leader of the Boston Symphony, he was often poetic and always dramatic. His previous experience had been chiefly in the opera house, and it was natural that he should constantly strive after effect. Imaginative by nature, he at times made the mistake of wishing to give fictitious importance to music that was of slight proportions or inherently commonplace. His errors and extravagancies were those of unbridled enthusiasm. There were times when music of any period and of any character seemed to him a Hungarian Rhapsody.

He now returns to this country with more poise, with a more sober judgment, with a finer sense of values, but he has not lost his remarkable magnetic quality. He is still a poet, but not one of the contemplative or introspective school. He is still intensely dramatic, but he is no longer deliberately sensational. The years have added to his weight; his face is thoughtful; he has the calmness, not the apathy, of the mature, completely rounded man. While his individuality is as pronounced as ever, it does not stand between the composer and the hearer; it is illuminating and glorifying.

As in the years gone by he has the great gift of presenting a melodic instrumental thought as though it were a song sung by a master of bel canto. He himself is a master of phrasing. He still delights in sudden and marked contrasts, but he preserves the continuity of thought; episodes do not become mosaic work; the structure is always visible, and not merely as though it were drawn in black and white. He is a supreme colorist, and he delights in purple patches.

Yet his reading of Brahms's Symphony, which is for the most part austere, granitic music, or music in a dull gray, was as effective as when with Tschaikowsky he saw the lost souls in the whirlwind of the Inferno. We have heard nothing nobler and at the same time more dramatic than his reading of the introduction to the last movement of Brahms's Symphony. He is no longer a poet of wild irregularities; he is a master of poetically dramatic expression.

Warmly welcomed, he was enthusiastically applauded by an audience that filled the balconies and not half of the floor.

He will give a second and last concert on Saturday afternoon, April 27, when the program will include Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and excerpts from Wagner's operas.

CONDUCTOR NIKISCH WARMLY WELCOMED

SPLENDID CONCERT BY LONDON ORCHESTRA

At Times Enthusiasm of Symphony Hall Audience Reached Fever Heat Stage.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—"Leonora Overture," No. 3.
Tschaikowsky—"Francesca Di Rimini," symphonic poem.
Brahms—Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Wagner—"Tannhauser Overture."

It was a concert of great importance in itself, introducing, as it did, a great foreign orchestra, but it was of double interest to Bostonians since it brought back to us one of our old symphony conductors who has now attained the pinnacle of fame in his especial branch. Our symphony conductors have all won laurels abroad and Mr. Paur and Dr. Muck have also taken high rank in European symphonic and operatic work. But none has achieved the eminence of Arthur Nikisch.

But if it is impossible to exaggerate the fame of this conductor, this is not quite the case with the London orchestra. It staggered Boston somewhat to read, in the new Encyclopedia Britannica, the plump statement of Dr. Hans Richter: "The London Symphony orchestra is the finest in the world." But Dr. Richter knows as much about America as a cow knows about mathematics, and he has not the remotest idea of the reputation and the high standard of the Boston Symphony orchestra. But Herr Nikisch knows all about this and we doubt not but that he would have been pleased to have directed his own old band, which "Die Musik" of Berlin has lately characterized in almost the very words that Richter showered upon the Londoners.

However, let us place the superlatives on one side and at once acknowledge that the London Symphony orchestra is a splendid organization, not quite so marvelous as our own in the departments of the strings and the wood-wind, but superior in the brasses. We had an excellent chance to compare the two organizations for the Beethoven overture was played under Mr. Fiedler only four days ago. The trumpet passages were somewhat more pianissimo, and the horn passages a little less sure last night, but the contrasts were superbly brought out and the violins in their final ecstatic outbursts rivalled the glory of our own great band of violinists.

But the "Francesca da Rimini" symphonic poem by Tschaikowsky has never had such a dramatic interpretation in Boston as Mr. Nikisch gave to it last night. By the explosions it was evident that hell was full of dynamite, but these tonal outbursts were well warranted by the subject, and the four chromatic whirlwinds were most exciting. The contrasts also were given with vivid power. The lamentations of the unhappy pair of lovers were full of tenderness and pathos, and each climax was worked up with the hand of a master.

Gloriously did the orchestra second the intentions of its great conductor. In this work it was possible to judge of each department of the orchestra in detail. The trombones are certainly better than we are used to hear in our concerts. The contrabasses, too, are of wonderful solidity of tone, without trace of raspiness. Clarinette and oboe are not as effective as those which we possess. We enter into these details only because the London orchestra has claimed the palm above our own organization, but when all this is said one must still pay homage to the sonority, the unity, the crisp attacks, the praiseworthy ensemble. We are glad to record that enthusiasm was at fever heat more than once, and the orchestra was forced to rise "en masse" and acknowledge the storm of applause it had aroused.

If one could not avoid making comparisons in the matter of the "Leonora overture," it was equally unavoidable to do so in the Brahms C minor symphony, for Dr. Muck won his greatest Boston triumph in just this work, played by our own Symphony orchestra. Nothing can ever efface the magnificence of the complex finale as he interpreted it. But Mr. Nikisch certainly repeated this triumph. The symphony is brimful of figure development, and the finale becomes in some degree an epitome of the entire work, bringing back reminiscences of the preceding three movements which are interwoven into the warp and woof of the movement in a wonderful manner.

With a lesser conductor the intellectual character of the symphony is alone prominent, but with a genius as conductor this intellectuality is wonderfully aflame with emotion also. It means a good deal to make Brahms seem exultant and triumphant, but that was the effect of the symphony last night, at least in its last movement. But there were great beauties to chronicle in the other movements also. The fiery character of the opening movement was the acme of nobility. Probably this movement has never had so clear, so intense, so intelligible a reading as Mr. Nikisch gave to it. Every one of the four movements was beyond criticism, but the first and last movements were memorable. Again we envied those contrabasses that the Londoners possess. What an irresistible effect was made with the rush of pizzicati!

The applause was frenzied after each movement, and while the orchestra was roundly applauded the audience made it very clear that the chief tribute was intended for Mr. Nikisch, for he was recalled again and again. He has grown into a master who is giving America a great lesson in the highest forms of instrumental music.

That blatant and flamboyant musical critic, Bernard Shaw, has made many errors in the course of his diatribes on the divine art. He once insinuated that Paderewski was utterly devoid of temperament; he held the old German folk-melody which is used in "Maryland, My Maryland," to be the weakest trash possible; and he intimates that the "Tannhauser overture" has become as trite and hackneyed as the overture to "William Tell." To a good musician the "Tannhauser overture" will never grow tame. With all the performances that Gericke, Paur, Muck and Fiedler have given us of this work, it is an ever welcome number on the programme. Mr. Nikisch even in his old Boston days won great success with it. But it seemed last night as if there were more of grandeur and of vivid contrast in it than we had ever heard before. The Venus music was of fire and flame; the apotheosis of the religious theme at the end was a memorable exhibition of violin ensemble, and trombone power, perhaps a trifle too much of the latter.

Almost exactly 19 years ago Mr. Nikisch directed this overture in our Symphony concerts, and we then said of the performance that "it had a virility and power that most thoroughly reflected the spirit of the composer." Yet, at that time, none of us knew the greatness of Arthur Nikisch, nor had he quite attained his present powers. But freedom of interpretation, abandon, poetic fantasy, he always possessed in large degree, although not then with the balance, the attention to detail, that blends with his present readings. Today his union of the poetic and the technical is marvelous. He is to come to Boston once more before his return to Europe, and on April 27 (a Saturday matinee) we are to hear Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic symphony," which will give the fullest scope to the conductor's intense emotional powers.

POST,

APRIL 10, 1912

NIKISCH IS WELCOMED AS VISITOR

London Symphony Orchestra Arouses the GreatestEnthusiasm

BY OLIN DOWNES

Arthur Nikisch, at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, led some remarkable performances last night in Symphony Hall. The galleries of the concert hall were filled to their capacity, while there were few on the floor on account of the very high price of the seats. The audience made up in enthusiasm what it lacked in numbers.

Mr. Nikisch was given a most friendly greeting when he entered; after every piece on the programme there were salvos of applause, and some even shouted. The orchestra played Beethoven's third Leonore overture, Brahms' first symphony, Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

NIKISCH A "GENIUS"

Mr. Nikisch has unquestionably those magnetic and creative qualities, as a leader and a musician, which for want of a better term are rather hastily dubbed "genius." No conductor has more absolute control and more intimate understanding with his men. Few conductors can obtain such a range of dynamic effects and present a palette so rich in all the wonderful and varied colors of which the modern orchestra is capable. He led a performance of the Brahms symphony which will be long remembered, not only for its spirit and dramatic fire, but for the classic grandeur of expression—the greatest performance of this epic among symphonies in the experience of the writer. Undoubtedly there wer those who disagreed with details of his performances, who thought Mr. Nikisch often guilty of over-accentuation of certain details and excessive individualism in interpretation; who felt that a less constant stream of virtuoso effects would have left the ears more rested at the end of the concert. But on the whole the great enthusiasm was more than justified.

Mr. Nikisch, as other conductors do nowadays, read his scores from memory. He played on a great orchestra as if it were an instrument under his fingers. His gestures were few and if anything rather constrained. The men responded not only to the gestures, but to the very thought of the leader, this in a manner that could not have been attained with any number of rehearsals, lacking the informing spirit at the helm. And in all that Mr. Nikisch did there was the utmost intelligibility and logic. Few conductors can give a more luminous exposition of every detail of a score, and often, in some familiar place, Mr. Nikisch found a new tempo or nuance that seemed the only possible way of dealing justly with the passage. The performance of the symphony was engrossing from the first moment to the last. The Titanic introduction, the [184] homeric conflict that follows and the striking reappearance of the introductory motive in the succeeding movements. The tempi taken were broader if anything, than usual, but wonderfully elastic and suitable to the slightest variation of development or mood. And this without fetish worship.

Mr. Nikisch was not overawed by the word "Brahms" when he came to the allegretto. He gave the section real lightness of mood and no small measure of humor. He read the Faust-like introduction of the finale most impressively, and he built up the finale itself to a colossal and most inspiring climax. Nothing was greater than his interpretation of this movement.

Beethoven Well Played

Some might dispute a certain measure of the overture, but none probably will gainsay the dramatic atmosphere of the introduction, the overpowering effect of the volcanic A flat chord, the felicitous announcement of the theme of the overture proper and other places, although the performance as a whole was too modern and too extreme in manner. The Tschaikowsky piece is but a virtuoso place display piece, saving the sinister opening measures and the middle section, one of the loveliest in all Tschaikowsky.

Mr. Nikisch played the piece for all it was worth, save that the middle section could have had yet more of the sensuous yearning so characteristic of Tschaikowsky, so appropriate to the tale told by Francesca, and that the second episode of this section was not done full justice by the wind-players. The Tannhauser overture was played with the utmost enthusiasm by the gentlemen of the orchestra, who fiddled, blew, and beat the drums like the sturdy Britons that they were, and Mr. Nikisch's interpretation was surpassingly dramatic, in spite of the ugly tone of the brass choir.

The orchestra's chief glory is the string division. The strings, of which there are an unusual number, give out an exceptionally rich, solid, and brilliant quality of tone. The woodwind department is not so fine, although the first flute, as he warmed to his work, played some passages admirably, and made the moment of the duet with the horn in the prelude to Brahms' finale exceptionally thrilling. The tone of the horns was often full and beautiful. If Mr. Nikisch had been less disposed to overblow the brass department more definite conclusions might be reached about their quality.

It is good to know that this orchestra, with Mr. Nikisch, will return to Boston for a second concert, on Saturday afternoon, April 27. The programme will include Wagner excerpts, and the "Symphonie Pathetique" of Tschaikowsky.

EVENING NEWS

From

Buffalo, N. Y.

Address

APR 10 19

Date

Estab.

SPLENDID WORK BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Second Concert of Season in Convention Hall Added to Its Reputation.

Buffalo has had the pleasure of twice welcoming the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, and the popularity of this arrangement on the part of the local management, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, was apparent last night in the greatly increased audience at Convention Hall and the warmth of Mr. Fiedler's greeting as he appeared to conduct the opening number, Weber's overture to Oberon.

The program continued with Beethoven's Eroica symphony; Richard Strauss' tone poem, Till Eulenspiegel; Tschaikowsky's Rococo variations for 'cello, played by Alvin Schroeder; the Wagner excerpts, Waldweben from Siegfried and the Ride of the Valkyries from The Valkyrie. In the performance of these the Boston orchestra, proved again its claim to be known as one of the chief prides of the nation. Its magnificent equipment, where technical perfection and command of every resource of tonal beauty possible only to the players who are also musicians, was an instrument of measureless power put unreservedly at Mr. Fiedler's service and most wonderfully was it used.

The glowing beauty of the Weber overture came out in brilliant color effect and awakened the memory anew to the romantic charm of this composer. Beethoven's great symphony was given with abounding understanding, enthusiasm and reverence of spirit. Breadth of interpretation, clarity of form and the simplicity that tells its own tale, marked the performance of this work, which was a pleasure to find on a season's program.

A performance of extraordinary brilliancy and effect was that of Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel, among the finest work of the evening. The wonderful interest of this tone poem, with its peculiar, matchless Strauss idiom, where orchestra virtuosity has unparalleled opportunity, was given utterance to in a superb manner and aroused some of the greatest applause of the evening. Final numbers were the Wagner excerpts, played with fascinating charm and eloquence, where every choir of the orchestra strove equally and successfully to show the supreme loveliness of its own music.

The fine technical command of his instrument, variety of shading, of phrasing, grace and charm with which he imbues every detail, was apparent last night in Mr. Schroeder's 'cello playing to the same degree that in his many years in concert has caused his work to stand out among the first of its kind. The performance of the theme and variations on a rococa theme by Tschaikowsy, was a delight from beginning to end, and no less than the soloist did the fine orchestral accompaniment lend to this effect. Mr. Schroeder was most enthusiastically received, being recalled several times after the performance.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME MAINLY NEW WORKS

OF GREAT INTEREST FROM BEGINNING TO END

Chief Offering Was Wallace's Symphonic Poem, "Villon," Which Has Dreamy Central Theme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—"Magic Flute" overture.
Mozart—Concerto for violin, in D major.
Soloist, Mr. Sylvain Noack.
Foote—Four Character pieces for Orchestra.
Wallace—"Villon" Symphonic Poem.
Delius—"In a Summer Garden."
Wagner—Prelude to "The Meistersingers."

Here upon the very verge of Mr. Fiedler's departure, it is fitting to say that no conductor, since the days of Mr. Henschel, has paid so much attention to keeping the Boston audiences abreast of the newest and the most important in music. Mr. Fiedler's programmes have generally been models in their make-up and generally in their performance as well. The programme of yesterday was fairly bristling with new works and had therefore an especial interest from beginning to end. The chief new work was a symphonic poem upon the subject of "Villon," the rascally French bohemian whom almost everybody is interested in, spite of his villainous career. Possibly Wallace followed the splendid essay of Robert Louis Stevenson in sketching the life of this "sad, mad, glad, bad poet." At any rate one would be more "en rapport" with the music if one read Stevenson's essay before hearing it.

William Wallace has thus far led a life very much in contrast with the adventurous career of William Vincent Wallace, with whom he is not related. He is the son of an eminent surgeon and himself began a medical career, which he finally changed to enter the musical field. He has written musical books and essays as well as symphonic poems. Of course there is a certain amount of pepper in the music which deals with a poet who is at the same time a thief and almost a murderer.

This symphonic poem is somewhat more tangible than the average modern works. There is a dreamy central theme, which might apply to a saint rather than to Francois Villon. There is a touch of the wildness of bohemia, and there is a gentle Carillon at the close, which is not nearly as good as Bizet's excursion into this field. The work was worth hearing and won sufficient applause.

But Mozart seemed especially attractive when contrasted with the modern musical troubles. The concerto was charmingly played by Mr. Noack. It is practically a long dialogue between the solo instrument and the orchestra. And these works of Mozart are more difficult to play than at first appears. One may make a dozen errors in the heavy modern concertos, but make one slip in such a work as this and it stands revealed like a flaw in a crystal. And there were two different Mozarts in the concert yesterday, for the Mozart of the "Magic Flute" overture was decidedly in contrast with the suave gentleman of the concerto. Mr. Noack was applauded to the echo, and recalled again and again.

Why do all the virtuoso conductors take the Fugal exposition of the "Magic Flute" overture, so furiously fast. Our violinists can carry out the lightning tempo, but it is almost impossible to follow the figures and the work might gain by a slightly more moderate Presto. But after Mozart there came more of the modern torture. The work by Delius is linked bitterness long-drawn out. There are about fifty places in the work where one hopes that the composer is going to wind up. But in every case he slips off and goes on further, until the auditor loses all patience. There is no valid reason for such a trial.

The much-debated composer Delius ought to change his name to Devious, for it would describe his music better. He is one of the men who carry a bunch of keys which they use in season and out of season. Even so pastoral a picture as "In a Summer Garden" has to be unlocked by several different keys. When Music, Heavenly Maid, was young, she used to stay in the key of C or G long enough for the auditor to catch his breath. But nowadays she sprints through the 24 major and minor keys, and a few others which have not yet been invented, until it resembles a musical Marathon rather than a symphonic poem.

Mr. Arthur Foote's orchestral vignettes were much more enjoyable, because less stilted and affected. We have sometimes thought of Arthur Foote as being of the contrapuntal school of Stainer, Bridge, Macfarren & Co., a school to which our $10,000 operatic composer, Horatio Parker, belongs. But in these little poems, inspired by certain stanzas of "Omar Khayyam," we found a surer hand, a most graceful and easy leading of the voices. The audience certainly appreciated the little poems and the composer was obliged to rise from his seat and bow his acknowledgments continually.

But this morning is not well-adapted to long musical reviews in a newspaper. The works of Foot in which most of the public were interested yesterday were found in the Marathon contest.

Suffice it therefore to add that the mastersinger Prelude was most grandly given, although there were some new points of tempo revealed. But we had not recovered from the tortures of Delius to be fully in the mood for Wagner.

The Pops.

But two more weeks remain of the Symphony season of 1911-1912. On Monday, May 6, Symphony hall will be cleared of its formal seats, which will be replaced by the familiar tables and chairs and that evening the 27th season of Pop concerts will begin. This year they will run but eight weeks instead of the usual nine, for the Symphony season was prolonged an extra week by a second western trip. The closing night of the Pops will be Saturday, June 29.

Free Press
Detroit Mich
APR 14 1912

LAUREL WREATH IS PHESENTED TO MAX FIEDLER

The concert given last evening in the Light Guard armory by the Boston Symphony orchestra was a noteworthy event in many ways. It closed the biggest and most successful season in the history of the Detroit Orchestral association. It was in the nature of a farewell by Conductor Max Fiedler, who is to return to Germany at the end of the season and who in all probability will no more be known by the western world. The program itself was an impressive one, impressive because of its composition and its length, and because of the opportunities it afforded the band to show its many resources.

Just before Conductor Fiedler raised his baton to begin the closing number on the program, Secretary N. J. Corey ascended the platform and in the name of the patrons of the orchestral association series presented him with a laurel wreath. In making the presentation speech, Dr. Corey gave Mr. Fiedler credit for much of the Detroit Orchestral association's progress. And he added, "When you took charge of the Boston orchestra four years ago, it was universally conceded to be the best orchestra in the world, yet under your direction we have watched it each year grow steadily better and better." Mr. Fiedler, in responding, showed considerable emotion. He thanked the people for the support they have given him in the past, spoke of the pleasure it has afforded him to come to Detroit and quite refused to say "good bye," contenting himself with "au revoir," and expressing the hope that he may one day again greet a Detroit audience.

The program consisted of the overture to Weber's "Oberon," the mighty "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, the Tschaikowsky "Nutcracker" suite, and "1812" overture, and for 'cello solo, the entrancing Tschaikowsky variations on a rococo themes. After listening to all the other orchestras that from time to time have visited this city, the Boston orchestra still impresses the hearer with the fact that it has a lustre all its own, a perfection, a supreme virtuosity which makes it the glory of the whole western world. Mr. Fiedler conducted the Oberon overture with a fire not often infused into even that brilliant composition, and his tempos at times were such that none but the most skillful musicians could have accomplished them without blurring the themes. The reading of the symphony was a thing to be remembered as a pattern by which to judge all future hearings. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler was peculiarly on his metal. It is certain that while he paid due regard to tradition, there were times when his tempos were all his own and that he gave attractive new readings of some parts of the old score. In the Marcia funebre he largely subdued the voices of his orchestra, but in the scherzo and finale they burst out again in great fullness. The brightness and delicate cleverness of the Nutcracker suite, it is among the most delightful music Tschaikowsky wrote, seemed to stand out in pattern-like clearness, and the "1812" overture, which followed it, seemed by contrast doubly heavy and massive. The overture is "effective" music of the frankest variety but it is good to hear it occasionally as the Boston orchestra plays it.

Alwin Schroeder, the soloist of the evening, gained four recalls by the manner in which he played his Tschaikowsky variations. The number was played here earlier in the season by Boris Hambourg. Hambourg's virtuosity was as fine as Schroeder's, possibly it was greater, but Hambourg's had nothing of the largeness of tone, and fullness of understanding which Schroeder had. If Mr. Schroeder habitually does work of the sort he did last evening, Detroit should hear him oftener.

CITIZENS
Brooklyn N. Y.
APR 10 1912

PHILHARMONIC AUXILIARY.

Women Plan for Boston Symphony Concerts.

The spring meeting of the Women's Auxiliary to the Philharmonic Concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was held in art room, Academy of Music, yesterday, at 11 o'clock, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, presiding. There was a large attendance.

Mrs. Frank M. Lupton read the report of the executive committee, Mrs. Charles F. Pray read the secretary's report, in which was a concise resume of the twelve seasons of the concerts since the auxiliary was formed. Receipts from concerts in the four years that they have been housed in the Academy of Music, were, respectively, $12,251, $11,638, $12,212 and $12,672. Regret was expressed because of the departure of Max Fiedler, conductor, and a cordial welcome assured to Dr. Karl Muck next season. The report suggested that a farewell letter be sent to Mr. and Mrs. Max Fiedler, and afterward, on motion of Mrs. Otto Goepel, seconded by Mrs. Dwight Parker Clapp, the letter was ordered sent.

Mrs. Dike said that the indications are that the opera house will not contain all those who will to attend the concerts next season. About 500 could not obtain tickets for the last concert this season. Plans for next season's concerts will not be announced until the fall, after Dr. Muck's arrival from Germany.

185

GLOBE-
APRIL 20, 1912.

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THREE NOVELTIES

Mr Foote's Character Pieces Give Pleasure.

Mr Noack Plays Mozart Violin Concerto in Admirable Taste.

There was an abundance of new music at the 22d Symphony rehearsal yesterday. Four Character Pieces by Arthur Foote, William Wallace's Symphonic poem, "Villon," and "In a Summer Garden" by Delius were played for the first time in this city.

Of these the most interesting were Mr Foote's short pieces, which are orchestrations of his set of "Five Poems after Omar Khayyam" for pianoforte. Although impressionistic, they observe organic form and a coherent development of detail. They exhibit freshness, charm and versatility of imagination. There is no attempt at slavish or literal imitation of the verses chosen as text, but rather a free fantasy, at times rhapsodical, improvisational, rather than studied, and colored with fancy and deft skill.

There is variety of orchestral timbre and combinations of timbres, as in the prodigal and barbaric glory of the first theme of the second number to the lines beginning "They say the Lion and the Lizard keep," or the changing play of light on the languorous organ point on E against the stanza, "A book of verses underneath the bough," etc, or the speccati in triplets on muted violins in the passage termed Scherzo, or the voluptuous song for 'celli preceding the last—were all instances of a graceful and poetic imagination and a cunning hand in orchestral painting.

Mr Foote has obtained effects by his no less happy invention both in melodic curve and the cast of his rhythms, hightening by both devices the Oriental character of his music. This is a quality present in a variety of moods, both in contemplation, as the exquisite middle section of the first piece, and in opulent splendor, as the pages which precede and follow it. There is, however, no disturbing symbolism involving any disputed pedigrees either of the lion or the lizard, nor is there any fastidious and pedantic system of labeling themes to provoke the pathological fanaticism of some or the supercilious contempt of others.

Mr Fiedler conducted these pieces with regard for their oriental grace and beauty, and the orchestra played with sensitivity. Mr Foote was obliged to stand three times at his place forward on the floor and acknowledge the applause.

The skillful modulation of emotional effects which make this group both a recurring inspiration and alleviation to the ear Delius' number conspicuously lacks. Why should the tonality of the Summer garden be unremittingly minor? Mr Delius has not always pitched his tent in England, but dwelt for a time in Florida. There is marked economy in contrasting harmonic and instrumental color. There is also a wearying repetition of figurative accompaniment, a trait which has frequently freighted down Granville Bantock's style.

Delius is cosmopolitan in taste. He acknowledges no obvious model, yet there are passing allusions in grouping to Puccini, and he favors the strabismic Debussyian scale. There are good ideas and evidences of good craftsmanship in the work, but there is little fertility of invention or sense of variety either in form or arrangement.

The symphonic poem, "Villon," by William Wallace, a contemporary Englishman who preferred music to his father's profession of surgery, proved an interesting work, revealed no mean order of imagination or of technical ability, one which invites further comment than can be made this morning. The characteristics of that graceless scamp "Villon," his superb daring in the fashioning of both his pungent verse and his riotous deportment, are not mere fanciful attributes of this score, nor is it lacking in a lively and discerning sense of tonal color and of various interpretative devices. The piece was an agreeable acquaintance, and was warmly applauded.

Mr Noack gave true pleasure by his finesse and informing spirit of his playing. He was content to interpret and reveal Mozart rather than renovate or distort him. Here was grace, elegance and true refinement of style, clarity in florid passages, bel canto worthy of Mr Bonci in sustained sorg and a pure and expressive tone.

The prelude to "The Maestersinger made the program over long, and Fiedler conducted it slightingly a showing marked care and appre tion for the novelties. The overt to "The Magic Flute" was the opress ing number.

COMMERCIAL
Buffalo, N. Y.
APR 10 1912

ENTHRALLING MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gave Splendid Concert Last Evening.

AT CONVENTION HALL.

Final Appearance of Max Fiedler as Conductor of Famous Orchestra —Mr. Schroeder Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, gave the last concert in the series of six arranged by Mrs, Mai Davis Smith at Convention Hall last evening and a large audience was on hand to greet the eminent conductor and his fine body of well trained musicians. The music lovers of Buffalo were aware that the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are among the best heard here, and the appreciation of the efforts of these musicians was amply demonstrated after each number last evening.

Interest was added to this concert in so far as it was the farewell appearance here of Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the four years of his activities at the head of this famous organization. Mr. Fiedler has won the respect and admiration, for his artistic ability, of music lovers all over this country. He is a giant in the musical world. He possesses a strong personality and he has the power of making the musicians do things just as he wishes. His subtle magnetism appeals alike to orchestra and audience and he has absolute control of the orchestra at all times. The orchestra is one big instrument to Max Fiedler and like a master-organist he plays upon it and produces the most wonderful combinations and effects.

The tonal volume of the orchestra last evening was greater than ever. Such tones of velvety softness and ravishing beauty have never been heard here before and the splendid blending of the instruments was immense. For rythmic freedom, great dynamic variety and an intimacy of comprehension the work of these fine musicians is indeed notable. Everything was executed with precision and repose and the intelligent treatment of the different works afforded the deepest pleasure to all who were present.

The program was opened with an admirable reading of Weber's overture, "Oberon." The lovely pianissimo tones of the violin, the bell-like tones of the reed instruments and the round, sweet tones of the French horns won the admiration of the vast audience.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was the principal number on the program. This is one of the finest compositions in the whole musical literature. Beethoven speaks to us in a language no one has spoken before, and the warmth and depth of his ethical sentiment is now felt the world over. The orchestra gave a superb performance of the symphony.

The other numbers for the orchestra were "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Valkyrie," Wagner. All were magnificently played.

Alwin Schroeder, principal violoncellist of the orchestra, was the soloist and he played "Variations on a Rococo Theme," by Tschaikowsky. He is an artist of the first rank and his success was immense. He is complete master of his instrument and he gave a superbly spirited performance of the Tschaikowsky composition.

The orchestra played the accompaniments in a very pleasing manner.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Journal
Field Mass
APR 16 1912

Fervent Farewell to Fiedler in New Yo

American March

Extraordinary Display of Feeling an Enthusiasm at Close of Boston Orchestra's Concert.

NEW YORK, March 23.—The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to an end this afternoon at Carnegie Hall with an almost unprecedented display of feeling and enthusiasm. After the program the dignified audience rose en masse, the ladies waved handkerchiefs and programs, while the men raised their hats high in the air and cheered until Conductor Max Fiedler had returned six times and finally raised his hands for silence.

When the house was quieted, Mr. Fiedler said:

"Ladies and Gentlemen: I am more successful conducting an orchestra than I am conducting a speech, but I want to tell you how grateful I am for the continued help and sympathy. For four years you have helped me with your kindness and enthusiasm and now that I am going to leave you I beg that you won't forget me too soon."

THEATRE FILLED TO CAPACIT

Great Concert By Bo ton Symphony

NET PROFIT $200

An audience that taxed the Colo theatre to the utmost heard the con by the Boston Symphony orche with Mis Florence Hinkle of Bos soprano, last night. It was the g est musical event of the year in H field and one of the most enjoy and artistic entertainments ever g this city.

It was through Ben Franklin that the orchestra, of which Max Fiedler, who gets a salary of $20,000 a year, is leader, came to this city. They have been touring in a special train and arrived here yesterday from Detroit. They left about midnight for Boston.

Every seat in the house was taken including the top tier of boxes, which have been occupied only once or twice since the theatre was built. Mr. Franklin's expenses for the concert were about $2,000 and as the sale of tickets netted $2,200 he will clear up close to $200.

It was just 8.25 when Mr. Fiedler waved his baton for the beginning of the concert and it was over at 10.10. There were six numbers on the program and the audience was exceedingly enthusiastic over each one. Pittsfield and Berkshire society was largely represented in the audience, which was in every respect one of the most brilliant that ever atended a concert in this section.

During the final number a tremendous thunder shower came up and when the concert ended it was pouring. There was a hurried call for carriages, but the telephone worked only intermittenly as one of he bolts of lightning had knocked out the wire and Manager Daniels who did every thing he could to summon help was unable to raise central.

Many in the audience waited until the shower was over at 11, while others started right out in the rain. Mr. Daniels received word from the Springfield Union at 9.30 that the Titanic had gone down with 1,500 aboard and he at once posted in the lobby half a dozen bulletins which were scanned with great interest after the concert by those waiting for the shower to pass over.

The opening number was the overture to the opera "Der Freischutz" by Carl Maria von Weber and with the rendering of this beautiful selection, the orchestra immediately won itself into the hearts of the big audience. Weber was born at Eutin, Oldenburg, December 18, 1786 and died at London, June 5, 1826. The music for 'Der Freischutz" was written by him and the book by Friedrich Kind. The opera was first performed at Berlin, June 18, 1821 and was the first to be performed in the new theatre, Schauspielhaus. Weber wrote in his diary that the opera was received with "incredible enthusiasm; Overture and Folk-song were encored; fourteen out of seventen music pieces were stormily applauded. Everything went exceedingly well." And so it was last night at the Colonial, the big house showed its appreciation of this wonderful overture by calling Conductor Max Fiedler to the front a number of times. The effect of this overture has been overwhelming wherever it has been played. In London where the opera was first performed in English, July 22, 1824, at the English opera house, W. T. Park wrote, "The overture embraces most of the subjects of the airs in the opera, ingeniously interwoven with each other and is quite original."

The word Freischutz, literally 'free marksman' means a Schutz or marksman, who uses Freikugeln, that is free bullets,' or charmed bullets which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the marksman's aim, and therefore aptly termed 'free.'

Ludwig Van Beethoven's Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Op 92, was finely given. The first sketches of this symphony were made by Beethoven probably before 1811 or even 1810. He was born at Bonn, December 16, (?) 1770 and died at Vienna, March 26, 1827. The most pleasing movement of the four and the one which was best received was the third, Presto, F major, 3-4. It is a brilliant scherzo. The theme of the trio, assai meno presto, D major, 3-4 is said to be that of an old pilgrim hymn in Lower Austria.

Miss Hinkle is a wonderful singer and her beautifuly toned voice captivated the audience. She sang but twice and although applauded vehemently, did not respond to encores. Her first number was the air from "Louise," Act 3, scene 1, by Gustave Charpentier. This opera was performed one hundred times within a year at the Opera-Comique, Paris. Charpentier was born at Dreuze, France, June 25, 1860 and is now living at Paris.

Miss Hinkle's second selection came just before the final orchestral number. This was the aria, "Tosca," prayer from second act "Vissi d'Arti," by Puchni. In this aria, Miss Hinkle's voice was heard to even better advantage than in the former number. Giacomo Pucini was born at Lucca, June 22, 1858, and is now living. "Tosca," a melodrama in three acts was performed for the first time at the Martin Theatre, Paris, November 27, 1887.

The fourth and sixth selections by the orchestra were by Wagner. They were the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" and overture from "Tannhauser." Richard Wagner, this celebrated musician, was born at Leipsic, May 22, 1813 and died at Venice, February 13, 1883. The thought of 'Tristan and Isolde" was first mentioned by Wagner in a letter to Liszt in the latter part of 1854. Both the Prelude and Love Death were performed in concerts before the production of the opera at Munich. The Prelude, slow and languishingly; in A minor, 6/8, is a gradual and continued crescendo to a most sonorous fortissimo; a shorter

The overture to "Tannhauser," familiar to almost everyone, closed the concert and although the applause was continued for several minutes, an encore was not forthcoming. Conductor Feidler, however, bowed his thanks.

The first period of the movement of this overture is taken up wholly with bacchanalian music from the opening scene in the Venus mountain; and the motive that answers the ascending typical figure, the motive for violins, flutes, oboes, then oboes and clarinets, is known as the theme of the baccanal, "the drunkenness of the Venus mountain." This period is followed by a subsidiary theme in the same key, a pasionate figure in the violins against chromatic passages in the 'cellos. There is stormy development; the violin figure which accompanied the pilgrims' chant returns, and the coda begins, in which this chant is repeated. The violin grows swifter and swifter as the fortissimo chant is thundered out by trombones and trumpets to full harmony in the rest of the orchestra.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Fiedler's engagement with the orchestra which is now closing its 31st season ends this year. He has been summoned by Emperor William back to Berlin to lead the imperial orchestra and the present leader of that orchestra, Karl Muck will take his place. Many of the players in the Boston orchestra receive a salary of ovr $100 a week.

For several years Mr. Franklin has had the orchestra give two concerts a year each in Albany, Troy and Schenectady.

MR. NIKISCH MAKES FIRST AMERICAN CONCERT SUCCESS

Montreal Gazette

NEW YORK—With Arthur Nikisch, one of the foremost conductors in the world, holding the baton the London Symphony orchestra gave its first concert in America in Carnegie hall last night. The program presented was the same as that announced for the Boston concert tonight. It comprised the Brahms First symphony, the Beethoven "Leonora" overture, No. 3, the Tschaikowsky "Francesca" fantasia and the Wagner "Tannhaeuser" overture.

Mr. Nikisch made a significant success of the work which is considered to be the chief test of his powers in his American programs, the Brahms first symphony. The slow movement went somewhat ponderously under his direction, as it has under that of many another conductor. But it had all its dignity and depth of meaning. The last movement was read with an effect which stamped Nikisch as the master of the day as a climax builder. The audience was enthusiastic in its applause at the close of the symphony. The Beethoven overture exhibited the tact of Nikisch for fine shadings and for simple nobility of expression.

The string department of the orchestra disclosed an extraordinary largeness of tone, though not exceptional richness. The brass section had that power of tone and that control in subdued passages which Nikisch has developed in it to his applause. The woodwind section was not so distinguished as the rest of the tone body.

COMPOSER FOOTE IS GIVEN OVATION

Journal Apr. 20

Symphony Audience Pays Tribute to Dean of Boston Musicians.

It was to Arthur Foote, the composer, and not to any conductor or soloist, that the big reception was given by the audience at yesterday's Symphony matinee.

Mr. Foote, who now ranks as the dean of Boston musicians, was represented on the program by his "Four Character Pieces," transcribed from his piano setting of the "Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam." These charming pieces were never heard here before, though they were played by the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago several years ago. Mr. Fiedler discovered the composer seated down front, and the enthusiastic applause lasted until the writer of these little tone poems stood up and bowed again and again.

Two other compositions were performed here yesterday for the first time, the Scottish William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon," and the English Frederick Delius's impressionistic pastel, called "In a Summer Garden." The soloist, Sylvain Noack, second concertmaster of the orchestra, exhibited his delicate art and suave tone in the Mozart concerto for violin—the fourth of the Salzburg concertos—in D major. The overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute" and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" completed the program, which will be performed again tonight.

Emil Ferir, the viola player, will be next week's soloist. The orchestra will offer two novelties, Salome's dance, from the most famous of all the Strauss operas, and "Marsyas," a symphonic idyll by Arthur Shepherd. A ladies' chorus, made up of members of the Musical Art Club, will assist in the performance of one of the Debussy

What Max Fiedler's Work Means to Boston

FIEDLER'S FOUR YEARS REVIEWED

Symphony Leader and Former Professor of Music Talks About Modern Tendencies of Orchestra and Discusses Composers

ON Saturday evening, May 4, Max Fiedler closes his four years' engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, giving the last concert in the annual Boston series. Mr. Fiedler is the sixth man to hold the Symphony conductorship in the 31 years that the orchestra has been in existence. His predecessors were: Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer and Muck. Two men among the six have been remarkable for their influence in developing the orchestra's power of expression. They are Gericke and Fiedler. Henschel simply helped start things going and is not to be counted as one of the conductors that have given the orchestra its reputation. Two men in the list have been remarkable for the individuality of their interpretations. They are Nikisch and Muck. In general, two main influences have been at work in Symphony leadership. There has been the influence that tended to enlarge the technique of the orchestra, represented by Gericke, the man who liked neat and precise execution, and by Fiedler, the man who likes broad, expansive tone. And there has been the influence that tended to brilliantly characterized expression.

This influence is associated with the names of Nikisch and Muck, and to a less degree with that of Pauer. The technical influence kept the orchestra in a subjective mood during Gericke's first administration and prepared the way for the career of Nikisch in the late eighties and early nineties. The most picturesque career in the history of the Symphony conductorship is that of Nikisch. The technical influence of the second Gericke administration prepared the way for the readings of Muck, the most comprehensive in conception, the most acceptable to the public as a whole of any ever given in the old Music hall or in latter day Symphony hall. And now a new technical influence, one that has had an extraordinary enthusiasm impelling it, has prepared the orchestra for another period of Muck's readings. When Karl Muck takes the concerts in hand next October he will find an entirely different group of tone makers before him from that which he left in the spring of 1908. His opportunity as an interpreter will be different from what it was formerly, just because his men have a new technique and his listeners a new habit of attention.

Dr. Muck will find conditions changed in other ways, too. He will become aware that instead of directing a community orchestra which plays primarily a double series of home concerts and secondarily a series or two of road concerts he is directing a traveling orchestra, which practises its programs publicly at headquarters twice weekly for three weeks and does its real work on tour. Max Fiedler, almost without anybody realizing it, has broadened the ministrations of the orchestra in the country just as surely as he has increased its technique of tone.

Aims Modern

Mr. Fiedler has done his work for Boston in the manner of a modern man. He has been the most liberalizing force the orchestra has ever known, not even excepting Nikisch. He is the one conductor who has dared to assert that music is a contemporary art and not solely an art of the classic past. He has dared to tell modern men that they can find their true self-expression only in music of their own day. He has taught his American public to respect contemporary composers as earnestly and intelligently voicing the aspirations of modern men. In the last two years of Max Fiedler's conducting the Boston Symphony concerts the cryings-out against Richard Strauss as a maker of insincere and sensational noise have ceased in the land. The progressive Symphony conductor has taught us to respect our own musical epoch.

The time when Mr. Fiedler first gave his position unmistakable statement was at his production of Bruckner's symphony No. 8, at the concerts of March 12 and 13, 1909. With an effort at large interpretation such as he has never surpassed, he then declared that the days of harping on the classic string were over in Boston. Henceforth the line of march was to be into the domain of modern symphony. The public has followed Mr. Fiedler's lead from that time without wavering. It has naturally enough had its days of regretting that its old Beethoven pleasures were no more; but it has never thought of turning back. Boston has been a progressive musical city since the production performances in March and the repetitions in April, 1909, of the Brucknerian masterwork. Symphony listeners found they could stand a triple climax of the full brass, and that they could enjoy to the end the longest adagio ever orchestral writer composed. They discovered in these things an expression of their modern selves, and they rejoiced in the discovery.

Efforts Specialized

Mr. Fiedler's conducting has been successful in all works wherein he has tried to make it so. It has always met the demand of large compositions of whatever period, from Beethoven's choral symphony to Strauss' "Don Quixote" tone poem. It has invariably risen to the demands of every modern piece that had respectable musical content. It has been frankly unimposing in many works of the old school. Mr. Fiedler has never been a man of pretenses. Any casual visitor at the Symphony concerts could tell which numbers on the program were there because the conductor wanted to perform them, and which were there because the audience from habit required to hear them. The conductor was willing to please his hearers by keeping them fresh in their classics, but he would not compromise the modern efficiency of his tone choirs just to give the old fashioned a pretty half hour of Haydn.

Composers that Mr. Fiedler has interpreted to praise almost invariably are Berlioz, Schumann, Tschaikowsky and Strauss. He has been unequal in Beethoven, rather oftener falling short of distinction than reaching it. He has been unequal, too, in Brahms, but never quite rising to his best or dropping to his poorest. In the music of Debussy he has brought applause to himself and appreciation to the composer. All new music Mr. Fiedler has presented with the enthusiasm of one who is optimistic about the art of his own generation. Soloists usually have been a disturbing, rather than a contributing element in the concert scheme. There have been times when Mr. Fiedler made the solo number part and parcel of his program idea, but as a rule, he, as conductor, cares as little about music for orchestra and assisting artist as the modern composer does. Mr. Fiedler twice showed himself a chorus conductor of great ability, but he saw that choral music was out of popularity in Boston, and he had more important work to do than to try to revive it. His leading of the Cecilia Society in the "Omar Khayyam" of Bantock, with the entire Symphony orchestra accompanying, was one of the memorable efforts of his third year. The pension fund concerts of the orchestra have proved that Mr. Fiedler has the gift of winning the large musical public. Remarkable approval has been given the conductor by the academic audience that attends the eight annual Symphony concerts in Sanders theater, Cambridge.

Patronage Increased

Mr. Fiedler has been a sympathetic listener as well as an attention-compelling interpreter during his residence in Boston. He has gone to the chamber concerts of organizations formed from the Symphony orchestra, like the Hess-Schroeder quartet and the Longy Club, and he has frequently attended the performances of the Boston opera company. He made himself known on two or three occasions as a composer. He has not made himself known in Boston in one of his significant characters, that of pedagogue. And it is to be regretted that none of the many aspiring musical students of Boston have had the opportunity to know him as their professor. A most instructive talker on his art Max Fiedler is. His room on the second floor of Symphony hall, at the head of a stairway leading from the neighborhood of the stage, is the place to see him. There he has his piano, and there, the visitor imagines, he studies his scores in preparation for rehearsal.

"During my four years in Boston I have produced many new works," said Mr. Fiedler. "The work we have done has filled our performing time completely. Seven orchestral trips, five eastern and two western, besides the 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston make a busy season for both conductor and players. I will not say it to my own praise, but to that of the orchestra, that during my directorship the size of the audiences has increased until we play to capacity houses in almost every city of the tours. For two or three seasons the halls in which we have appeared have almost all been sold out. The public everywhere on the western trip from which we have just returned was cordial.

"At my last appearance in Detroit and in New Bedford they presented me with a wreath as a token of farewell. In Brooklyn they did the same and one of the officers of the Institute of Arts there made a speech. The expressions of the two New York audiences were quite overwhelming.

"I cannot say that I came to Boston with my mind made up to pursue a particular line of action. But my purpose in general was clear. I intended to do the biggest things possible with the Boston organization. I wanted to exhaust the entire literature of the orchestra down to date. And I think I have accomplished what I set out to do.

"Necessarily I have put the emphasis on modern works. The public has desired this of me. The difference between the music of today and that of 100 years ago? Modern orchestral music is music of sound. It fascinates the ear. The classical music is music of idea, that is to say, there are more ideas, page for page, in an old symphony than in a modern one. Ideas are the principal thing in all music. No modern work succeeds without them; the modern technique makes them go farther, that is all. It is the modern piece that arouses interest, both in listeners and in performers.

"We have to study hard to interpret the old music. It is difficult to get back to the pure, old art. Any roughness in execution, any slip in fingering is noticed. But in modern music slight imperfections pass unobserved. The symphonies of the old masters are like chamber music. They are troublesome to perform well.

"People today are interested in the composers of today. They like Strauss, Debussy and Rachmaninoff, because the orchestral sound which they provide is so wonderful and because the technical requirements they make on the artists are so vast. Today a viola player and a double-bass player has to have as much technique as a violinist. Strauss, when a conductor protests to him that one of his passages is impossible for artists to execute, only says: 'Oh, well, if they cannot find a way to do it now, they will by and by.' He pushes the technical abilities of orchestral players. 'You will find out how to do it,' he tells them.

"Strauss has wonderful talent, the greatest of all living composers. But Wagner's talent was greater than his. Wagner is the greatest master of the orchestra, after Beethoven. But of course he does not come in for comparison as a symphonist, because he wrote only operatic music. The greatest composer since Beethoven in the field of the symphony is Brahms.

"The public is inclined to find fault with performances of the classic compositions on the ground that they give so small an amount of orchestral sound. If a conductor puts a Wagner or a Strauss number on the first part of his program and a Beethoven or a Mozart number on the second part, people will make the complaint that the classic piece does not have enough sound. I have formed the practise, therefore, of presenting my classical pieces at the beginning, placing musical thoughts before my audience first and making a crescendo from classic idea to modern sound.

Training of Men Perfected

"The sound which can be brought out of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the most wonderful I ever heard. A remark commonly made to me by listeners in the cities of the Symphony tours is, 'They play not like 80 or 100 men, but like one man.'

"Players who work under one conductor for four years learn to interpret music exactly as he wants it. I make a movement with my finger, and the Symphony men respond at once. If I want to slacken or hasten the time of a passage, if I wish to bring out in a particular way some color combination, I indicate my idea by an expression of my face, and the men act instantly.

"The orchestra has presented many novelties during my engagement and it has played the compositions of Strauss more than it ever played them before. One of the men associated with the orchestra a while ago made a compilation of all our Strauss performances, showing the works played, with the dates and places, and sent it to the composer. He was greatly pleased to see how he was appreciated in America. The mastery which Strauss has of orchestration is marvelous. He knows exactly what effect he wants always.

"Reger has remarkable talent for composing in the old style. But his work lacks inspiration. He is a successful imitator of the style of Bach. He writes fugues which are colossal. His intellectual output is enormous. Quite the opposite in purpose from Strauss, he is a writer of absolute music. Reger's fugues and variations disclose enormous ability in the old art of counterpoint. Besides Strauss and Reger there is no other really great man composing for the orchestra in Germany.

French and Germans

"I am charmed with the modern French works. They are wonderful in their instrumentation. They seldom make noise. I have conducted with great joy D'Indy's symphony No. 2. D'Indy has remarkable knowledge of what instruments can do. He knows exactly what registers sound well. He knows at just what point one instrument can best take a melody from another and carry it on. On paper his writing sometimes looks strange. You can look at it and wonder what kind of sound it will make. But you hear it played, and it always sounds well. D'Indy is very severe in his style, but he is modern in his ideas and in his tone coloring.

"Debussy is a new talent and he brings original color to the orchestra. He is a successful impressionist. He knows how to reproduce outward effects, like street sounds and field sounds, which he hears. His imitative genius can be studied particularly well in the first movement of his "Iberia," the one called "In the streets and waysides." In the second movement of that work, the one entitled "Odors of the night," you have his atmospheric effects. His orchestration in this music is very delicate, so delicate that it is difficult to perform. All roughnesses of execution show. Debussy is perfect master of his technique. He uses the full modern orchestra, but his scoring is light. I am to present his nocturnes at the next Symphony concert. In the third movement of that piece, called 'The Sirens,' female voices sing a sort of obligato to the orchestra, using the sound "ah." It is as though the [illegible] sounded through the mist. Debussy thinks of the sirens descriptively. The vocal color represents them, and the orchestral color represents the fog covering the rocks and the sea.

Program Idea Considered

"Program music, rightly conceived, successfully describes scenes and events. This music of Debussy is an example of the successful kind. The "Don Juan" tone poem of Richard Strauss is another. The necessary thing in program music is the same as in absolute music; it must be built on themes. It must have musical ideas which can be worked to a constructive end. Mere fantasy in music is nothing. If a composer be inspired by a literary poem to write a corresponding tone poem, it is useless for him to set to work without thematic ideas. The outcome of his efforts must be music that you can see the meaning of as music, or else it is of no value. The subject itself must be musical, too, and it must appeal to the composer. Strauss thinks of Don Juan, his love making and his jokes, and he illustrates him. But what he says is expressed in clear themes. Rachmaninoff handles his subject in his tone poem, "Todteninsel," in the same way. He gets the atmospheric effect, but he does it through musical ideas. It is a general principle in program music that the better the musical ideas are the more effects it is possible to attain. The only difference between program music and the other kind is that the composer of it does not have to stick to the classic forms. He states the phases of his subject or theme which suit his purpose. He does not hold himself to the ancient sequence of first subject, second subject, working-out and recapitulation.

Wagner's preludes are akin to program music in their treatment. The "Tannhaeuser" overture retains something of the old overture form, but the preludes have nothing of it. Wagner's general scheme in them is to lead up to a climax and then go down to the plane he started from. The "Lohengrin" prelude is composed on this triangular plan. But the preludes all contain definite musical thoughts, and these thoughts are connected. Any music, however free in form, must be constructed intelligibly; it must have architecture, or it is meaningless.

Recognition Won

When Mr. Fiedler was asked to come to Boston and lead the Symphony concerts, he held the post of director of the Hamburg conservatory. Also he held the conductorship of the Philharmonic concerts of Hamburg. His plans after leaving the Boston position which he has held since the fall of 1908 are undetermined.

The German master of the orchestra likes to tell how he won recognition in Hamburg. He went to that city on leaving the conservatory at Leipsic. He taught in the Hamburg conservatory for 25 years. From instructor he became director and finally director. He began to give orchestral concerts on his own hook, competing with the Hamburg Philharmonic concerts and the concerts Nikisch gave with the Berlin orchestra and with concerts by Weingartner besides. He held on for 10 years, when the Hamburg Philharmonic acknowledged defeat. The negotiations for peace resulted in his giving up his own concerts and taking the conductorship of the Philharmonic. While holding his two Hamburg positions he directed concerts in Berlin as guest conductor. He had engagements in many European cities, including St. Petersburg five weeks each year for five years as guest conductor of the Imperial Music Society. He appeared as visiting conductor in Moscow, Antwerp, Paris, Madrid, Rome and Turin; also in Edinburgh, Birmingham and London. He made his first appearance in America with the Philharmonic Society of New York in 1904.

"Guest conducting as a general policy is not advisable," Mr. Fiedler reflected. "It is a refreshment for the players to have a new man lead them occasionally, but it is better for them in the end to run to have a permanent director.

"The question of chorus singing? Well, you must ask Dr. Vogt of Toronto about that. I have never seen a chorus conductor like him or heard a choir like his. Siegfried Ochs of Berlin, I always thought, had something pretty good in the chorus line, but his singers have not such interest in their work as Dr. Vogt's have. The members of Ochs' choir are paid. But the Toronto singers are all voluntary. Dr. Vogt disbands his choir every spring and makes every man and woman who wants to enter in the autumn pass a new examination. But that's only half the story. Dr. Vogt told me that there were five other choirs in Toronto just as good as his."

Max Fiedler puts a laugh and a good word for a fellow musician into every swing of his office door.

SYMPHONY BATON CHANGES HANDS

(Photo by Garo, Boston)

Max Fiedler closes four years of service as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra on May 4

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Berkshire Eagle
Pittsfield Mass
APR 16 1912

[187]

FIEDLER'S LAST AMERICAN APPEARANCE IN THIS CITY

Kaiser Recalls to Berlin the Noted Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Gives Magnificent Concert In the Colonial Theatre—His Successor Is Dr. Karl Muck, Equally Famous as a Director—Program of Rare Excellence Enjoyed by Audience That Fills Playhouse to the Doors.

Ben. Franklin of Troy, Promoter of the Entertainment, Pronounces It a "Tremendous Success" and Says It Bears Witness to the Fact That the Public Likes Good Music—Miss Florence Hinkle of New York City Gets an Ovation—People Caught In Rain—Thunder Storm Climax of the Night's Activities.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Max Fielder, made its first appearance in Pittsfield last night.

Music lovers thronged the Colonial theater on South street. They came not only from the city, but from towns for miles around. No such musical treat has been accorded us since the New York Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Walter Damroch, appeared in this same theater several months ago. It is to the credit of Ben Franklin of Troy that this rare entertainment was provided. The expense of bringing the orchestra to the city was fully $2000, so that the venture, even with the 1400 seats in the playhouse occupied, did not represent a financial harvest for the promoter of the enterprise. Mr. Franklin holds the franchise governing the appearance of the orchestra in cities in this section of the country.

Without doubt the fame of the orchestra and the importance as a social event of its appearance here played their large part in attracting to the Colonial many of those in the great audience, but the larger part of the company which for nearly two hours sat under the spell of classic melody had been attracted by the expectation of hearing a concert of extraordinary charm and worth and none who came was disappointed. Fiedler is a great conductor—one of the greatest in the service—and under his direction are many of the most talented musicians that money can secure.

THE PROGRAM.

Overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber
Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92, Beethoven
I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
IV. Allegro conbrio.
Air, "Depuis le jour," from "Louise," Charpentier
Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner
Aria, "Tosca," prayer from second act, "Vissi d' Arti," Puccini
Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner
Soloist, Florence Hinkle, soprano.

30 YEARS' RECORD.

"For 30 years," says a note dealing with the famous organization, "the Boston Symphony orchestra had held undisputed leadership among organizations of its kind in America. It has fixed a standard of performance which has placed this country in a most enviable position among the musical peoples of the world. It has been the means of introducing to the American public under the most favorable conditions the works of all modern composers deemed worthy of a hearing; and, at the same time, it has cherished the best music that has come down to us from the past. Its entire career has been marked by a catholic and cosmopolitan taste which has sought to present in a perfect manner the best works of all schools and of all periods. With a personnel perhaps unequalled in the world, its distinguished conductors have achieved artistic results which have marked a new era in orchestra music in this country.

"Although, as its name indicates, its home is Boston where its greatest activity is exerted, it has long since outgrown the limits of any city and has become, in the full sense of the term, a national institution."

And it was not only as a Massachusetts, but as a national institution, that the Boston symphony was welcomed to Pittsfield. The hundreds who gathered to spend a delightful evening in the theater, will long remember the masterly interpretation of the great works of those who have, in the years gone by, wrought so magnificently in the realm of enchanted sound. They will find that there has been stimulated within them something of a new love for music that is music, for melody compared to which the so-called popular tunes of this twentieth century time seem cheap and trashy. The orchestra, now in its 31st season, is a permanent institution maintained solely for concert purposes. Its support should be such as to insure it many, many more seasons wherein to instruct and entertain and refine.

MISS HINKLE'S SUCCESS.

Not alone upon the orchestra did the interest last night rest for Miss Florence Hinkle, the brilliant soprano soloist, came in for her share of the honors. Her magnificent voice, with all its richness and power and splendid range, contributed mightily to a concert that for sheer excellence has not been surpassed in Pittsfield in recent years.

Miss Hinkle whose home is in New York city, sang in a high school concert in this city several years ago and was therefore pleasantly remembered by a great many people. She received an ovation both times she appeared. The Charentier and Puccini numbers were splendidly adapted for her voice, and she enjoyed that of which so many vocalists are deprived—sympathetic accompaniment.

HIS FINAL APPEARANCE.

Symphony hall, the home of the Boston symphony orchestra, was constructed especially for concert purposes, and the very best results are, of course, obtainable there. Nevertheless, one of the musicians stated last night that the acoustic properties of the Colonial are excellent—far above the average of those in theatres given over to miscellaneous amusements.

Few of those in the audience knew that the Pittsfield engagement was the last public appearance in America of Max Fiedler, the active and brilliant conductor. He has been recalled to Berlin by the kaiser, and Dr. Karl Muck goes from Berlin to Boston to succeed him. Fiedler was "loaned" to the Boston orchestra by the kaiser and has been in this country four years. During that time he has appeared in most of the principal cities. His salary has been $20,000 a year. Dr. Muck will receive $23,000 a year.

The Boston symphony, which consists, on the average, of 100 men, is without doubt the greatest symphony orchestra in the world. A short time ago the London symphony appeared in New York and competent critics declared that its work was excelled by that of the Boston symphony. It is the ambition of every musician who devotes his life to classical work to one day be a member of this organization. Many attempts to get places in the ranks but a comparatively few achieve the goal of their ambition.

The orchestra came to Pittsfield from Detroit where it had filled a very successful engagement.

Mr. Buhler, who has given Berkshire people many delightful Chamber music concerts, was of material assistance to Ben Franklin in the preparation of the program. Wisdom and admirable taste were manifested in selection. Those who regretted that neither the orchesta nor Miss Hinkle responded to the generous encores will be interested to know that under the rules governing the orchestra, encores are not permitted.

Mr. Franklin said to The Eagle that the concert was a tremendous financial success. He was unable to "give a line" on the profits, for the bills were not all in. In regard to the concert he said:—

"It as been conclusively demonstrated that the public wants good music and will patronize it when it is provided. Look at this great audience—isn't it inspiring?"

Prof. F. J. Liddle, director of the Pittsfield symphony orchestra, said:—

"It was magnificent—especially the symphony. Fiedler's readings are wonderful."

Hundreds were in evening dress and many beautiful gowns were worn.

THE STORM RAGED.

Shortly before the concert was over—it began at 8.15 and ended at 10.15—the thunder storm broke in all its fury. Youngsters who were fortunate enough to be on hand reaped a harvest from their service in going after raincoats and umbrellas and galoshes. The livery men, too, were much in demand and every available rig was pressed into service. It was a busy time for motor cars too. Few of those who attended the concert were prepared for a rain and many badly damaged gowns were among the results of the storm's visitation.

THE WEBER OVERTURE.

Manager C. A. Ellis of the orchestra publishes in attractive form the historical and descriptive notes which Philip Hale, the well known critic, prepared and which deal with choice Pittsfield program. It is recorded by Mr. Hale that "Der Freischutz," a romantic opera in three acts, book by Friedrich Kind, music by Carl Maria Von Weber, born at Eutin, Oldenburg, December 18, 1786—died at London, June 5, 1826—was first performed at Berlin June 18, 1821. It was the first opera performed in the new theater Schauspielhaus, erected by Schinkel in 1819-1821, to replace the original building, which was burned down in 1817. Weber wrote in his diary that the opera was received with "incredible enthusiasm, overture and folk song were encored; 14 out of 17 music pieces were stormily applauded." The first public performance of the overture was at Copenhagen, October 8, 1820. Weber was making a tour through North Germany and Denmark. The second performance was at Brunswick, October 31, 1820. And before the performance of the opera itself the overture was played for the third time at Dresden, December 18, 1820, at a concert given by Weber's friend, Henrich Joseph Barmann, the brilliant clarinetist, and the grandfather of Carl Baermann of Boston. When the opera was performed in London W. T. Parke wrote: "The music of this opera is such a continued display of science, taste and melody as to justify any praises bestowed upon it. The overture embraces most of the subjects of the airs in the opera, ingeniously interwoven with each other, and is quite original. The grandeur of some passages and the finely contrasted simplicity of others produced an effect which was irresistible. It was vehemently encored."

Two hundred and nineteen of the 342 measures of the overture are in the opera itself and yet there is no thought of patchwork. As has been well said: "Weber's overture, far from being kaleidoscope series of tunes, is absolutely symmetrical in form in that it comprises an exposition of the melodies utilized, a section in which they are worked out, and a climacteric coda." Although the originality of the music is striking, Weber did not escape the charge of plagiarism and this charge has been repeated by some who evidently did not take the trouble to investigate for themselves. The arrangements of the overture are numberless and some are curious.

The overture begins adagio C major 4-4. After eight measures of introduction there is a part-song for four horns. This section of the overture is not connected in any way with subsequent stage action. After the quartet the Samiel motive appears, and there is the thought of Max and his temptation. The main body of the overture is molto vivace, C minor 2-2. The sinister music rises to a climax, which is repeated during the casting of the seventh bullet in the wolf's den. In the next episode, E-flat major, themes associated with Max (clarinet) and Agathe (first violins and clarinet) appear. The climax of the first section reappears, now in major, and there is use of Agathe's theme. There is repetition of the demoniac music that introduces the allegro, and Samiel's motive dominates the modulation to the coda, C major, fortissimo, which is the Apotheosis of Agathe. It is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, kettledrums and strings. Mr. Apthrop wrote in his notes to a program book (January 7, 1899): "I believe there is no other word in any other language that corresponds accurately to the German Freischutz. The literal English translation, 'Free Marksman,' does not in the least convey its meaning. The same may be said of the Italian 'Franco Arciero'—under which misleading title the opera was given at Covent Garden—and the French 'Franc archer.' Grove has it that the opera was given under this last title at the production under Berlioz in Paris, but Berlioz himself says nothing of this in the account of the production he gives in his memoirs and Wagner reports distinctly that it was then given as 'La Freischutz.' The word 'Freischutz' (literally 'free marksman') means a Schutz or marksman, who uses 'Freikugeln—that is 'free bullets' or charmed bullets which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the marksman's aim, and are therefore aptly termed 'free.'"

BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY.

Ludwig Van Beethoven born at Bonn, December 16, 1770, died at Vienna, March 26, 1827.

The first sketches of this symphony were made by Beethoven probably before 1811 or even 1810. The score of the symphony was dedicated to the Count Morits von Fries and published in 1816. The edition for the pianoforte was dedicated to the tsarina Elizabeth Alexiewna of all the Russias.

The symphony is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, kettledrums, strings.

I. The first movement opens with an introduction, poso sostenuto, A major, 4-4. A melodic phrase is given to the oboe, then clarinets, horns, bassoons, against crashing chords of the full orchestra. This figure is worked contrapuntally against alternate ascending scale passages in violins and in basses. There is a modulation to C major. A more melodious motive, a slow and delicate dance theme is given out by wood-wind instruments, then repeated by the strings, while double-basses, alternating with oboe and bassoon, maintain a rhythmic accompaniment. (A theme of the first movement is developed out of this rhythmic figure, and some go so far as to say that all the movements of this symphony are in the closest relationship with this same figure.) The initial motive is developed by the whole orchestra fortissimo, A major: there is a repetition of the second theme, F major: and a short coda leads to the main portion of the movement. This main body of the is distinguished by the persistency of the rhythm of the "dotted triplet." The tripping first theme is announced, piano, by wood-wind instruments and horns, accompanied by the strings. It is repeated by the full orchestra fortissimo. The second theme, of like rhythm and hardly distinguishable from the first, enters piano in the strings, C-sharp minor, goes through E-flat major in the wood-wind to E major in the full orchestra, and ends quietly in C major. The conclusion theme is made up of figures taken from the first. The first part of the movement is repeated. The free fantasia is long and elaborate. The third section is in orthodox relationship with the first, although the first theme is developed at greater length. The coda is rather longer.

II. Allegretto, A minor, 2-4. The movement begins with a solemn first theme played in harmony by violas, violoncellos and double-basses. The strongly marked rhythm goes almost throughout the whole movement. The second violins take up the theme, and violas and violoncellos sing a counter-theme. The first violins now have the chief theme, while the second violins play the counter-theme. At last wood-wind instruments and horns sound the solemn, march-like motive, and the counter-theme is given to the first violins. The rhythm of the accompaniment grows more and more animated with the entrance in turn of each voice. A tuneful second theme, A major, is given to wood-wind instruments against arpeggios for the first violins, while the persistent rhythm is kept up by the basses. There is a modulation to C major, and a short transition passage leads to the second part. This is a repetition of the counter-theme in wood-wind instruments against the first theme in the basses and figuration for the other strings. There is a short fugato on the same theme, and the second theme enters as before. There is a short coda.

III. The third movement, Presto, F major, 3-4, is a brilliant scherzo. The theme of the trio, assai meno presto, D major, 3-4, is said to be that of an old pilgrim hymn in Lower Austria. "The scherzo in F major is noteworthy for the tendency the harmony has to fall back into the principal key of the symphony, A major." A high-sustained A runs through the trio.

IV. The finale, Allegro con brio, A major, 2-4, is a wild rondo on two themes. Here, according to Mr. Prod'homme and others, as Beethoven achieved in the Scherzo the highest and fullest expression of exuberant joy,—"unbuttoned joy," as the composer himself would have said,—so in the finale the joy becomes orgiastic. The furious, bacchantic first theme is repeated after the exposition, and there is a sort of coda to it, "as a chorus might follow upon the stanzas of a song." There is imitative contrapuntal development of a figure taken from the bacchantic theme. A second theme of a more delicate nature is announced by the strings and then given to wind instruments. There are strong accents in this theme, accents emphasized by full orchestra, on the second beat of the measure. Brilliant passage-work of the orchestra, constantly increasing in strength, includes a figure from the first theme. There is a repeat. The first theme is then developed in an elaborate manner, but the theme itself returns, so that the rondo character is preserved. There is a return to the first theme in A major. The third part of the movement is practically a repetition of the first, but the second theme is now in A minor. There is a long coda with a development of the figure from the first theme over a bass which changes from E to D-sharp and back again. The concluding passage of the theme is used fortissimo, and the movement ends with a return of the conspicuous figure from the main theme.

AIR FROM LOUISE.

Air from "Louise," Act III, Scene I. Gustave Carpentier. Born at Dieuse, France, June 25, 1860. Now living in Paris.

Louise having left her home, is living with Julien on the Butte de Montmartre. At the beginning of the third act, Julien, sitting in the little garden at their house with book in hand, is plunged in happy meditation. Louise, leaning on the railing of the steps, looks at him lovingly.

"Since the day that I first gave myself unto you, my destiny seems all in bloom. I seem to be dreaming under a fairy sky, with sky still intoxicated by your first embrace! What a beautiful life! My dream was not a dream! Ah! I am happy! Love stretches over me his wings. A new joy sings in the garden of my heart. Everything is astir, everything rejoices with my triumph. Around me all is laughter, light and joy, and I tremble deliciously at the charming remembrance of the first day of love. What a beautiful life and what happiness! I am too happy * * * and I tremble deliciously at the charming recollection of the first day of love."

"Louise," which is a musical romance in four acts and five scenes, libretto and music by Carpentier, was first produced at the Opera-Comique, Paris, February 2, 1900.

"THE MUSIC OF WAGNER."

Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," Richard Wagner. Born at Leipsic May 22, 1813; died at Venice February 13, 1883.

The thought of Tristan and Isolde was first mentioned by Wagner in a letter to Litz in the latter part of 1854 the poem was written at Zurich in the summer of 1857 and finished in September of that year. The composition of the first act was completed at Zurich, December 31, 1857. The "action in three parts" was performed for the first time at the Royal Court theater, Munich, June 10, 1865; the first performance in America was at the Metropolitan theater, New York, December 1, 1886; the first performance in Boston was at the Boston theater, April 1, 1895. Both the prelude and the Love Death were performed in concerts before the production of the opera at Munich. The prelude was performed for the first time at Prague March 12, 1859.

The prelude, Langsam and schmachtend (slow and languishingly), in A minor, 6-8, is a gradual and long-continued crescendo to a most sonorous fortissimo; a shorter decrescendo leads back to pianissimo. It is free in form and of continuous development. There are two chief themes; the first phrase, sung by 'cellos, is combined in the third [illegible] with a phrase ascending chromatically and given to the oboes. These phrases form a theme known as the Love Potion motive, or the motive of Longing; for commentators are not yet agreed even as to the terminology. The second theme, again sung by the 'cellos, a voluptuous theme, is entitled Tristan's Love Glance.

The prelude is scored for three flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes, cor anglais, two clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, strings.

Isolde's Love Death is the title given, as some say, by Liszt to the music of Isolde dying over Tristan's body. The title is also given to the orchestral part of the scene played as concert music without the voice part. The music is scored for the same orchestra as the prelude with the addition of a harp.

Wagner wrote, after telling the legend of Tristan and Isolde down to the drinking of the philter: "The musician who chose this theme for the prelude to his love drama, as he felt that he was now in the boundless realm of the very element of music, could only have one care; how he should set bounds to his fancy, for the exhaustion of the theme was impossible. Thus he took, once for all, this insatiable desire. In long-drawn accents it surges up from its first timid confession, its softest attraction, through sobbing sighs, hope and pain, laments and wishes, delight and torment, up to the mightiest onslaught, the most powerful endeavor to find the breach which shall open to the heart the path to the ocean of the endless joy of love. In vain! Its power spent, the heart sinks back to thirst with desire, with desire unfilled, as each fruition only brings forth seed of fresh desire till, at last, in the depths of its exhaustion, the starting eyes see the glimmering of the highest bliss of attainment. It is the ecstasy of dying, of the surrender of being, of the final redemption into that wondrous realm from which we wander farthest when we strive to take it by force. Shall we call this death? Is it not rather the wonder-world of night, out of which, so says the story, the ivy and the vine sprang forth in tight embrace o'er the tomb of Tristan and Isolde?

THE ARIA.

Prayer from the second act of "Tosca." Giacomo Puccini. Born at Lucca, June 22, 1858. Now living.

Tosca, a melodrama in three acts, text founded by L. Illica and G. Giacosa on Victorian Sardou's drama, "La Tosca." The first performance in the United States was at the Metropolitan Opera house February 4, 1901.

TOSCA
(in deepest sorrow).

Love and music, these have I lived for, * * * nor ever have harmed a living being.
The poor and distressful, times without number, by stealth, I have succored. * * *
Ever a fervent believer, my humble prayers have been offered up sincerely to the saints; ever a fervent believer, on the altar flowers I've laid. * *
In this, my hour of sorrow and bitter tribulation, oh! Heavenly Father, why dost Thou forsake me?
Jewels I gave to bedeck Our Lady's mantle;
I gave my songs to the starry hosts in tribute to their brightness. * * *
In this, my hour of grief and bitter tribulation, why, Heavenly Father, why hast Thou forsaken me?

—Translation into English by W. Beatty-Kingston.

WAGNER AGAIN.

Overture to the opera, "Tannhauser," Richard Wagner.

"Tannhauser und der Sangerkrieg auf Wartburg," romantic opera in three acts, book and music by Richard Wagner, was first performed at the Royal Opera house in Dresden, under the direction of the composer, on October 19, 1845.

The first performance in the United States was at the Stadt theatre, New York, April 4, 1859. The New York Evening Post said that the part of Tannhauser was beyond the abilities of Mr. Pickaneser: "The lady singers have but little to do in the opera, and did that little respectably."

The coda of the overture was cut out, and the overture was connected with a new version of the first scene of the opera for the performance of the work in a translation by Charles Nuitter into French at the Opera, Paris, March 13, 1861. Some consider therefore the overture in its original shape as a concert overture, one no longer authentically connected with the opera.

The overture is scored for piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, bass tuba, kettledrums, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, strings.

It begins with a slow introduction, Andante maestoso, E major, 3-4, in which the pilgrims' chorus, "Begluckt darf nun dich o Heimath, ich scauen," from the third act, is heard, at first played piano by lower wood-wind instruments and horns with the melody in the trombones against a persistent figure in the violins, then sinking to a pianissimo (clarinets and bassoons). They that delight in tagging motives so that there may be no mistake in recognition call the first melody the "Religious Motive" or "The Motive of Faith." The ascending phrase given to the violoncellos is named the "Motive of Contrition," and the persistent violin figure the "Motive of Rejoicing."

The main body of the overture, Allegro, E major, 4-4, begins even before the completion of the pilgrims' song with an ascending first theme (violas), "the typical motive of the Venus Mountain."

"Inside the Horsel here the air is hot;
Right little peace one hath for it, God wot;
The scented dusty daylight burns the air,
And my heart chokes me till I hear it not."

The first period of the movement is taken up wholly with bacchanalian music from the opening scene in the Venus Mountain; and the motive, that answers the ascending typical figure, the motive for violins, flutes, oboes, then oboes and clarinets, is known as the theme of the bacchanal, "the drunkenness of the Venus Mountain." This period is followed by a subsidiary theme in the same key, a passionate figure in the violins against ascending chromatic passages in the 'cellos. The second theme, B major, is Tannhauser's song to Venus, "Dir tone Lob!" The bacchanal music returns, wilder than before. A pianissimo episode follows, in which the clarinet [illegible]

(over) the appeal of Venus to Tannhauser, "Geliebter,komm, sieh' dort die Grotte," the typical phrase of the goddess. This episode takes the place of the free fantasia. The third part begins with the passionate subsidiary theme,which leads as before to the second theme, Tannhauser's song, which is now in E major. Again the bacchanalian music, still more frenetic. There is stormy development; the violin figure which accompanied the pilgrims' chant returns, and the coda begins, in which this chant is repeated. The violin figure grows swifter and swifter as the fortissimo chant is thundered out by trombones and trumpets to full harmony in the rest of the orchestra.

PRICES OF SEATS.

The scale of prices for the concert was as follows:—Main floor seats; $2.50 each; first seven rows balcony, $2.00 each; next four rows balcony, $1.50 reserved seats in gallery, $1 each; lower boxes, seating six, $15 each; upper boxes, seating six, $12 each.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Berkshire Eagle
Pittsfield Mass
Address
Date APR 16 1912

OUR SPLENDID CONCERT.

It is not going too far in the field of praise to say that Pittsfield people last night listened to one of the choicest concerts of purely classical music that it has ever been their privilege to enjoy. The event demonstrated among other things that, given an entertainment that rises above the dead level of ordinary things, the public is quick and generous in responding to its appeal. Those who thronged the Colonial were there not only to enjoy but to learn—and how keen was the enjoyment and how stimulating the lesson! The city has tasted the best in symphony music? Will it hereafter be satisfied with anything that touches a point anywhere below that standard?

One thought must have been uppermost in the minds of those who gathered to enjoy this great treat and that was the thought of the Pittsfield smyphony. Cannot that orchestra be restored? Cannot it be assigned to a permanent place among those institutions that enter into the educational life of the community? Cannot the public spirit of the city, mingled with the fondness that exists here for music that is worthy, bring to pass that which is in every way desirable?

A short time ago a committee of musicians waited upon the board of trade and obtained from it assurances of moral support in a project designed to revive the orchestra which, through so many seasons, provided the city with musical entertainments of the highest class. The public may well lend its aid to the undertaking which, if carried to a successful conclusion, will contribute mightily to the prestige of the city. Surely Pittsfield has within its corporate confines as good musicians as play anywhere—indeed most of them rank above the average in sheer talent. To assemble and instruct them in classical orchestral work is the needed thing.

To Mr. Buhler thanks are due for valuable suggestions in the arrangement of the program which the Boston Symphony played last night. Most of the numbers chosen were numbers with which the greater portion of the audience was familiar. The great work—the symphony—was by Beethoven and the interpretation of the four movements was followed with breathless interest. Perhaps the favorite selection was the Tannhauser overture. From the gentle beginning to the crashing climax Fiedler led the magnificent orchestra with consummate skill—and when the finish came the auditory applauded until it almost seemed as if the orchestra would be compelled to break its iron-clad rule not to give encores. People half rose from their seats and then settled back again, hoping that they would be privileged to enjoy a few more strains of the wondrous music. But they were doomed to disappointment. All was done.

Have you ever read that wondrously poetic tribute to the music of Wagner, a tribute written by a man who "did not know one note from another and therefore had no prejudice on the subject"? If you haven't you will want to read it and if you have you will want to read it again so here it is:—

When I read Shakespeare, I am astonished that he has expressed so much with common words, to which he gives new meanings; and so when I hear Wagner, I exclaim: "Is it possible that all this is done with common air?"

In Wagner's music there is a touch of chaos that suggests the infinite. The melodies seem strange and changing forms, like summer clouds, and weird harmonies come like sounds from the sea brought by fitful winds, and others moan like waves on desolate shores, and mingled with these, shouts of joy, with sighs and sobs and ripples of laughter, and the wondrous voices of eternal love.

Wagner is the Shakespeare of music.

The funeral march for Siegfried is the funeral music for all the dead. Should all the gods die, this music would be perfectly appropriate. It is elemental, universal, eternal.

The love-music in Tristan and Isolde, is, like Romeo and Juliet, an expression of the human heart for all time. So the love duet in The Flying Dutchman, has the consecration, the infinite self denial, of love. The whole heart is given; every note has wings and rises and poises like an eagle in the heaven of sound.

When I listen to the music of Wagner, I see pictures, forms, glimpses of the perfect, the swell of a hip, the wave of a breast, the glance of an eye, I am in the midst of great galleries. Before me are passing the endless panoramas. I see vast landscapes with valleys of verdure and vine, with soaring crags, snow crowned. I am on the wide seas, where countless billows burst into the white caps of joy. I am in the depths of caverns roofed with mighty crags, while through some rent I see the eternal stars. In a moment the music becomes a river of melody, flowing through some wondrous land; suddenly it falls in strange chasms, and the mighty cataract is charged to seven-hued form.

Great music is always sad because it tells us of the perfect; and such is the difference between what we are and that which music suggests, that even in the vase of joy we find some tears.

The music of Wagner has color, and when I hear the violins, the morning seems to slowly come. A horn puts a star above the horizon. The night, in the purple hum of the bass, wanders away like some enormous bee across wide fields of dead clover. The light grows whiter as the violins increase. Colors come from other instruments, and then the full orchestra floods the world with day.

Wagner seems not only to have given us new tones, new combinations, but the moment the orchestra begins to play his music, all the instruments are transfigured. They seem to utter the sounds they have been longing to utter. The horns run riot; the drums and cymbals join in the general joy; the old bass viols are alive with passion; the 'cellos throb with love; the violins are seized with a divine fury, and the notes rush out as eager for the air as pardoned prisoners for the roads and fields.

The music of Wagner is filled with landscapes. There are some strains like midnight, thick with constellations, and there are harmonies like islands in the far seas, and others like palms on the desert's edge. His music satisfies the heart and brain. It is not only for memory; not only for the present, but for prophecy.

Wagner was a sculptor, a painter, in sound. When he died, the greatest fountain of music that ever enchanted the world, ceased.

Such is the melody that still "enchants the world" and such was the master mind and heart that made it possible. The man of moods, the man of intense emotions, the man who has loved to study and who loves to study now, the great problems which we call life and death, finds in the wondrous Wagner the sublime interpreter of all the wide range of human longings and desires, successes, ambitions, failures and regrets.

He is today the classic composer of the masses.

From
Address
Date APR 1912

FIEDLER CHARMS AT CLOSING SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Gives a Fine Performance of Heavy Program

The closing concert of the Symphony series, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra Wednesday evening, was a grand finale of a notable list of musical events.

Max Fiedler and his orchestra received a royal ovation. Fiedler directs with decision and authority. His readings are sane and his interpretations distinct. The orchestra again asserted its caliber in vehicles which were best fitted to test the temper and the quality of any body of players essaying a program which presented three great overtures, a symphony and one of the most stupendous works of modern composition.

In both the "Marriage of Figaro" and the "Tannhauser" overtures the orchestra gave performances that have never been surpassed here, and also in the G major Haydn symphony, with its happy freshness and good humor, even in its most serious movement, there were all the qualities—smoothness, beauty, richness and warmth of color, expressive shading and strongly contrasting dynamics without sacrificing nobility of tone—which have combined to give the known prestige to this particular orchestra.

The "Leonore" overture had many magnificent points of excellence, but lacked possible effects in extreme shading, which, with finer pianissomos, would have allowed greater range for climaxes.

The Richard Strauss tone poem, "A Hero Life," if not the most extreme method, which the composer has adopted in his still later works, of harnessing the tone language to an almost brutal realism, represents at least sufficiently elaborate means of portrayal to impress the hearer with the colossal scoring of what has been termed a not too modest autobiography. It was given a monumental nd technically superfine performance.

HERALD, APRIL 20, 1912.

22D SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Three Novelties on the Program, as Well as Mozart and Wagner Pieces.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 22d Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Concerto for violin No. 4, D major.....Mozart
Four Character Pieces.....Foote
"Villon," Symphonic Poem No. 6.....Wallace
"In a Summer Garden".....Delius
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".....Wagner

Mr. Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, gave a polished performance of Mozart's concerto, one of a set that Mozart wrote for his own use when he was at Salzburg. Mr. Noack's tone and art are admirably suited to this music which demands absolute purity, fine taste, a certain elegance, a certain distinction. The Andante and the Rondo are today the freshest portions of this concerto, which is nearly 137 years old. The opening Allegro has less character; in fact, it is rather tedious. Mr. Noack's performance was a noteworthy exhibition of the higher art of violin playing, and it is pleasant to add that it was fully appreciated by the audience.

The compositions by Messrs. Foote, Wallace and Delius were heard here for the first time. They are examples of program music. Mr. Foote's pieces are musical impressions inspired by a few quatrains of Omar Khayyam. They are short and unpretentious, but they have the requisite exotic flavor; they are conceived in a poetic spirit; and some of the pages are delicately imaginative. These little pieces, furthermore, are melodically and harmonically interesting; the themes are not too obvious although they make a direct appeal, and the harmonic scheme is not a case of hothouse modernity. The instrumentation is warm in color, appropriately varied, and without abuse of orientalism, real or pseudo. The piano pieces from which this music was transcribed were written in 1898. The orchestral pieces were first played in Chicago late in 1907.

William Wallace is best known here by virile songs for baritone; but he has composed many works of importance, and is an original thinker in music and also in literature, as is shown by his remarkable book, "The Threshold of Music," published four years ago. In "Villon" he attempts to reflect some of the moods of the poet, the "lettered holligan," as Henley described him; "Villon, our sad bad glad mad brother's name!" to quote from Swinburne's ballad.

And so Mr. Wallace, beginning with the general motto, "A poor little scholar who was named Francois Villon," gives a quotation or a title from Villon to the succeeding sections of his symphonic poem, as "Booze and the Blowens Cop the Lot," "I Mourn the Time of My Youth," "There's No Good Girl's Lip Out of Paris," as Swinburne translated the line, although "Lip" is hardly the word for "Bec." The music that portrays Villon as the wanton rolsterer and knavish mischief-maker is somewhat in the vein of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," though to hint at any deliberate plagiarism would be unjust. It would be difficult to depict in tones two similar characters without a certain similarity in treatment, or rather a suggestion of similarity.

Two or three sections of "Villon" stand out with peculiar distinctness and show vividly the indisputable talent of the composer: the section inspired by the famous "Ballade des Dames du Temps Jadis"; that which reflects the prayer of Villon's mother to the Lady of Heaven and Earth; and the ending with the bell of the Sorbonne sounding the Angelic Salutation. The first is eloquently melodic; the second, with its antiphonal use of harmonizations in old modes, has a quaintly pathetic, simple and mediaeval character; the third is strikingly original and effective.

All in all, "Villon" is one of the most interesting of the new orchestral works that have been produced here of late years. We should hear more music by this Scot of decided originality in thought and ability in expression.

The impressionistic sketch by Mr. Delius also has a motto—two lines from one of Rossetti's sonnets. To those dissatisfied unless they hear a "real tune," the opening and closing sections will seem vague, but even they must admit the singular charm of the middle part with its amorous eloquence, its tonal sumptuousness. And to those who believe in "impressionism," this whole work will be a thing of beauty, rich in color and nuances, atmospheric, vocal in suggestions of nature, "and all sweet blooms of love * * * while Spring and Summer sang."

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Wagner, Faust overture; Shepherd, Marsyas, mythological scene; Forsyth, Chant Celtique for viola; Strube, Fantastic Dance for viola; Debussy, Three Nocturnes; Strauss, Salome's Dance. Mr. Ferir, viola, will be the soloist.

TRANSCRIPT APRIL 20, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THREE NOVEL AND INTERESTING PIECES

Mr. Foote Takes a Hint from Omar, Mr. Wallace Finds Suggestion in Villon and Mr. Delius Writes a Rhapsody of a Summer Garden—The Pleasures of Each—Mozart Besides and Wagner—Mr. Noack as a Violinist of Taste

Had the three several composers of the new pieces played at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon been present in the flesh what might not have happened? The audience, the usual numbers of which the holiday had plainly lessened, liked all the novel music—Mr. Foote's "Character Pieces," Mr. Wallace's "Villon" and Mr. Delius's rhapsody, "In a Summer Garden." It approved Mr. Foote most and Mr. Delius least, but it was not chilly to any one of the three. Mr. Foote was listening in the parquet, a few rows from the stage. When the applause swelled after each of the "Character Pieces" Mr. Fiedler indicated the composer with a gesture and a smile, and when all four were done the audience called him twice or thrice to his feet. For the second time within two months, at the concert of the Cecilia and now at this Symphony Concert, Mr. Foote has deservedly received such reward from his audience. Like our other resident composers, he is not without honor among his own people. For the other two, Mr. Wallace, who is an enigmatic personality, was presumably somewhere in London, and Mr. Delius was sitting in the French springtime at his villa on the outskirts of Paris. Had they been visible, as they were audible, in Symphony Hall yesterday they, too, might have received and acknowledged due plaudits. Such fortune at home has been rare enough with either. As it was, Mr. Feidler bowed in their stead and in his own right, for the audience of Friday afternoon loses no opportunity, now that he is soon to go, to show its liking for him. It liked Mr. Noack, too, when he had played his little violin concerto out of Mozart. For he has gained quickly an individuality among the hundred men who yield the public of the Symphony Concerts its weekly pleasure and of whom separately it takes somewhat too little heed.

Mr. Fiedler is an elastic maker of programmes. He can be as austere as any academician of Leipsic or Vienna and let an overture, a concerto and a symphony (or its equivalent tone-poem) fill an afternoon. Or else, he can forswear academic precedent altogether, let the symphonies rest on their shelf, and arrange a programme, as he did on Friday, of six short pieces. According to his frequent liking, too, it blended the old classics, the new classics, and contemporary pieces; while some were familiar and some were strange. Mozart served for the old classics with the overture to his opera, "The Magic Flute" and the concerto in D major for violin that Mr. Noack played. Wagner in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" stood for the new and served also to show Mr. Fiedler's unabatable passion in displayful music for the rushing pace that blurs outline and shadings and for the tone that sacrifices sensuous quality to sweeping force. The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was not good to hear yesterday, in such slurring and mechanical performance. It suggested a tired and careless orchestra near the end of the season. Yet two hours before the band had been quite its normal self in the finely tempered sonorities of the overture to "The Magic Flute" in the running figures into which they fade, and in the rush and suspense of the ensuing fugue. All of which signifies that orchestras, like the rest of us, are human.

Mr. Noack was human, too, when he chose a concerto so inviting to his qualities as a violinist as that which Mozart wrote "when he was studying the violin to please his father." In the process he thought nothing of writing five concertos. Yet nowadays when Elgar, for example, writes such a piece for the violin, its occupies him for a year; he works with wrestlings, with prayer—and with occasional outgivings to the press. Perhaps the difference in quality of the concertos warrants the difference in the creating process. Mozart's, yesterday, was little more than agreeable tracery of ordered sound, in which the solo violin was the chief pattern-weaver. Elgar's, a few months ago, was sundry other things, compact of sober thought—and many notes—of grave emotions, and exacting passages for violin and of desire, thick with modern harmonies. Mozart's ran to a very light orchestral background, so light that Mr. Fiedler wisely reduced the number of the heavier strings, and even so could not escape a tone somewhat too weighty for this filigree music. For a while, through the first movement, the concerto ran to light brilliancy of figure and ornament that broadened now and then into flowing song, that had its play in an amiable little cadenza, that meandered in and out of tonal light and shadow. The slow movement was mere pensive song, but less touched than is usual in Mozart, with the charm of the mood that the eighteenth century called melancholy. But it did not lack the eighteenth century elegance when it kept the voice of the solo violin like a fine thread of song, or fused it with the woodwinds or let it whisper away among the other strings. And the final rondo was as elegant with its little leaping figures and its gaily artful play of melodies.

Mr. Noack's poise of style and his fine and delicate tone were the complement of this music. He did not try to emphasize it or to, give it the modern emotional or intellectual quality which is wholly alien to it. He was content to let the fine shimmer of his tone play over its figures, to take the little cadenzas with a light, cleanly cut, wholly elegant, but never hard, dexterity, to lead the melodies through their pretty curves of delicate song. The eighteenth century praised acutely in its phrase.

[188]

"a man of taste." It implied a fineness of understanding and appreciation, and of the means whereby they are expressed. It implied poise and charm. Mr. Noack, when he plays a concerto by Mozart, is a man of taste in all these senses.

Two of the three novel pieces had a literary background and sprang from poetic or characterizing suggestion fertilizing itself in and by music. Mr. Wallace, indeed, is almost as much writer as he is composer. He has written learnedly and originally of musical æsthetics. He has expressed himself in much verse and prose. He has even cultivated the graphic arts. And he has composed much music, little of which has made its way out of English concert rooms or for long in them. Once the discoverers and the defenders of the new generation of British composers built high hopes upon him. Now, some of them are prone to believe that his abilities and his inclinations are too diversified for concentrated achievement. The first impressions of his "Villon," as it was played yesterday, praise both. After the fashion of our musical time he has tried to characterize Villon in a tone-poem, and he bids us hear with the ear of the imagination, the vagabond poet roistering among the taverns of his mediæval Paris, singing the praises of the trulls and thieves who are his companions, or else mournfully meditating over their vanished ghosts, or maybe hymning Our Lady for his poor old mother, or vanishing finally into the mists—as they seem to us moderns—of mediæval poetry and romance. Wherefore Mr. Wallace has set appropriate fragments of Villon's verses over the divisions of his tone-poem.

With this stimulating hint, the music speaks readily for itself. It does suggest in tones the Villon who loved his vagabondage, who had his zest for tavern bouts and routs, who, being poet too, idealized his fellow-roisterers, who could turn mystic and pitiful, and who comes and goes to our latter-day imagination, with his troop of youth, through the lights and shadows of the Paris of Louis XI., to the rhythms of romance and the echoes of its voices. Mr. Wallace has been happy musically in the expression of these things; he has been truly poetic in the suggestion, at the end, of this final vision of Villon. He has written music that develops and unites itself symphonically and yet bears his imaginings of Villon upon its course. He is apt with the characterizing and intensive phrase, with the heightening touch of instrumental color. He is not so individual in his broader melody; it moves too steadily in large progressions to square-toed rhythms. It suggests the fulness of body, the amplitude of march that are already among the conventious, from Strauss downward, of much ultra-modern music. This melody is almost too amply, too securely songful, too "effective" for such a reckless and moody figure as Villon. Yet to most ears, that do not hear it too often, there is no resisting this largeness.

Certain familiar quatrains from the Rubaiyat make Mr. Foote's literary background and give him the suggestion that his music fertilizes—the quatrains of the lion and the lizard, of the book of verses underneath the bough, of the hour that is not to be wasted, of the spring that vanishes with the rose. They have stirred Mr. Foote to the writing of music that translates into tones the two voices of Omar—the voice of immediate sensuous delight and the voice of elegiac and quasi-philosophical reflection. Without elaboration or emphasis, the music has its exotic, its tangible, Oriental quality, not so much in the ordinary sense of rhythms, progressions and instrumental colorings that are the conventions of "Oriental" pieces, but in its distilling into tones of the mood of languorous, meditative revery, the epicurean and fatalistic mood of Oriental poetry. Mr. Foote, with unusual imagination and with no obtrusive effort has found felicitous expression for it in these "character pieces." It is their "character" and the listener hears it with answering imagination, in the quiet play of tonal light and shade over the languorous organ-point of one of the pieces, hears it in the sensuous warmth of some of the melodies or in passages where the music turns gently grave again and falls into its reveries after it has sounded with Oriental pomps and excitements. Like Mr. Wallace, Mr. Foote knows the means whereby musical development may go hand in hand with the poetic idea and in all the "Character Pieces" there is a pleasant surety and fitness of harmonic and instrumental means. Not often has Mr. Foote written for orchestra so happily, imaginatively and completely.

Mr. Delius, though he pins two verses of Rossetti to the title page of his rhapsody, "In a Summer Garden," looked in his heart and wrote, and looked also perhaps upon the colors of his flowers and the lights upon them as the breeze touched them—looked and felt and then set to music making, in his own peculiar spirit and fashion. The sunshine in the garden was bright and high; the flowers, may be, grew fantastically and were as glowing of hue; the breeze set them quivering like rippling waves. And so perhaps he keeps his flutes and oboes and clarinets and all his means to high instrumental coloring, playing brightly, lightly, almost flamingly and almost always in insistent motion, over the main body and substance of his rhapsody. That body is a low-voiced love song, insistently in the minor key, reticent but intense of feeling, avoiding every commonplace of melody or phrase or accent, yet charged with a gravity of intimate passion that can hardly release itself. It has its strange, subdued, austere, almost economical beauty. There is no expansiveness in it—no mere sensuousness for its own sake. Its voice is low, as of a passion that is articulate almost in spite of itself. Its coloring is the rich and shadowed coloring that horns lend it. It is the affectionate thought that is within the lovers in the garden when they may not and would not speak their passion. And around them are the high lights, the high colors, the incessant wavelike motion of the breeze. Once and once only does the still passion release itself and suffuse deeply all the music. Even then it remains of Mr. Delius's austere intensity that disdains all common means and voice, that would keep its own grave and terse distinctions. In all his music that has been played here none has had such full and rare beauty of design and accomplishment, of mood and impression. H. T. P.

From EXPRESS

Address Buffalo, N. Y.

Date APR 1 0 1912

MARVELOUS ORCHESTRA

Second Concert of Season by the Boston Symphony.

MAX FIEDLER LED

Last Appearance as Leader of the Organization Here.

The second Buffalo concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Max Fiedler was given last evening in Convention Hall, under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. The decoration of the conductor's stand with flowers and the unusual cordiality of his reception were tokens of his popularity and of the public regret that his appearance last night was his last in this city as leader of the Boston organization. By virtue of his splendid musicianship, joined to admirable conservatism and never-failing sincerity, Mr. Fiedler has constantly grown in the esteem of the musical public of this country during his four years' residence in the United States, and even those who at first regarded him as too conservative and self-contained have now given full recognition to his ability and achievements. All of the powers which have commanded sincere respect and genuine admiration were present in his mastery of the orchestra last evening, and the fervor of applause which rewarded his work was well justified.

Weber's Oberon overture; Beethoven's Eroica symphony; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, Strauss; Wagner's Waldweben and Ride of the Valkyries constituted the orchestral numbers. Variety was lent to the programme by the appearance as soloist of Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, who played Tschaikowsky's Variations on a rococo theme, the orchestra accompanying.

Perhaps never has the exceeding beauty of tone possessed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra impressed more deeply than in last night's concert. The velvety quality of the strings, the liquid clarity of the woodwind, the combined brilliance and mellowness of the brasses, were constantly in evidence. If possible, the orchestra seems to have gained in its range of color, and certainly it would be difficult to imagine more beautiful pianissimos from an orchestral body than those attained last night. An exquisite reading was given to the overture, at the close of which Mr. Fiedler was recalled again and again. It was in the symphony, however, that the marvelous work of the men aroused most wonder and enthusiasm. This masterpiece, which marked Beethoven's entrance into a "region where no man before had penetrated," was played with such nobility of conception, such splendid technical proficiency, such sweetness of tone and such oneness of feeling as to stir the admiration of the musical listener to its depths. Whether in the first movement, with its virile hero theme, which is heard in Protean forms; the pathos and dignity of the funeral march, the scherzo with its tripping lightness, given out by the orchestra like a solo instrument, or the final variations, the hearer knew not where to marvel most at the astonishing performance of the men and the musical readings of the conductor.

Even the skillful performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, could not lend interest to the cacophonous strains of Richard Strauss's deadly attempt at musical humor. It was a relief to turn to the Wagner numbers, which were delivered in a fashion to remember with keenest pleasure.

Mr. Schroeder aroused much enthusiasm by his playing of the Tschaikowsky composition, and he was warmly recalled several times. A beautifully balanced accompaniment was granted him by the orchestra. M. M. H.

From Times Grand Rapids Mich

Address

Date APR 1 3 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra is Heard

A thoroughly representative audience of Grand Rapids music lovers attended the concert given at Powers' theater last night by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The theater was completely filled, and rarely has a more enthusiastic and appreciative audience assembled in that playhouse.

From first to last, the program was one of rare interest. The orchestra was as perfect as such an organization can be, and this city surely will agree that the Boston Symphony is entitled to its rank among the first of the greaet orchestras of the world. Those who had been privileged to hear the organization at previous concerts were agreed that never before had it played with more spirit. The acoustic properties of the theater were such that the different choirs of the orchestra were heard perfectly.

Special interest centered in the De-

[illegible] number, the pre[illegible] Afternoon of a [illegible]aun. Frenchman seems to [illegible] Richard Strauss one [illegible] effects. The prelude is [illegible] small number of instrum[illegible] sic can transport one [illegible] world, this prelude can [illegible]

This writer has heard [illegible] spiegel" played many tim[illegible] before has it appeared [illegible] composition as it is when [illegible] by the Boston Symphony. [illegible] fect balance of the orchest[illegible] out new beauties, new ideas.

The Beethoven symphony, No[illegible] A major, was given a reading [illegible] few of the world's orchestra conductors could give it. As long as Beethoven is played with such reverence, his symphonies will never be displaced on programs. The "allegretto" and "presto" movements were particularly well played, if this orchestra can be said to play one number or movement better than any other.

The perfection of the orchestra's violins was most evident in the vorspeil to "Lohengrin." The human voice only can approach the pure, sensuous beauty of the first violins. The prelude to "Die Meistersinger" brought the program to a joyous conclusion.

The audience was so enraptured that it sat still for many minutes, cheering and applauding. It was only when Conductor Max Fiedler asked all the members of the orchestra to arise in acknowledgment of the applause that the audience regretfully filed out.

It is about 25 years since Frank Davis first brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to Grand Rapids. Let us hope another 25 years will not elapse before this city is privileged again to hear the organization.

POST,

APRIL 20, 1912

"VILLON" HEARD AT SYMPHONY

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, two orchestral works by William Wallace and Frederick Delius, modern Englishmen, were performed for the first time in Boston. They were the symphonic poem, "Villon," designed to express certain moods found in the poems of Villon, the glorious rascal of the 14th century, and the piece "In a Summer Garden," the title of which implies the thought of the composer.

It does not profit us much to inquire very closely into the meaning of each section of Mr. Wallace's symphonic poem, because the music itself has comparatively little significance or value, and if music is not vital in itself, as was pretty well proven yesterday, no amount of programme or of argument for its existence can make it so.

Mr. Wallace is commonly accounted one of the most individual spirits of the contemporaneous English school, a school which is doing its active most to throw off the shackles of tradition, discover national talent, if there is any, and encourage it to the utmost possible extent.

Mr. Wallace's excellent book, "The Threshold of Music" is considerably more creditable to him than his music heard yesterday. In the book Mr. Wallace, a truly progressive spirit, and a keen critic, is firmly on his own ground. But if the music heard yesterday is one of his most representative works, which we would be loath to believe, then it is fairly clear that Mr. Wallace had far better continue his inquiries into the future of musical development as a writer and a theorist rather than as a composer.

To the reviewer, there were two salient moments in "Villon"; the impudent theme of the bassoon near the beginning, and the passage in the old mode which is quietly and but effectively and greatfully instrumentated. Other than this, the music interested very little at a first hearing. And whatever the greater or lesser value of the passages just mentioned, it is very clear that there is little or no development and cohesion of themes or mood. The music is patchwork. The composer has a working knowledge of the orchestra, though not distinctive orchestral speech of his own. He has adopted a rather piecemeal programme for his work, and the score itself is even more piecemeal, disconnected, lacking any big propulsive main idea. And many measures are nothing but padding, poor padding, padding which shows that when Mr. Wallace wrote this symphonic poem he had not at command even the routine knowledge which helps many a modern writer who is short of ideas out of difficulties.

And the work of Delius was fully as disappointing, if not more so. This on account of the fact that Delius has shown himself to be a man of an exceptionally refined and poetic nature, that he searches hard after that beauty that so eludes him, and that if his desire for a certain rare harmonic expression that he cannot find were less torturing, he might come nearer to an artistic ideal that is evidently far above the heads of most who make music today. These two pieces were very disappointing, and we have yet to hear the new word in music so anxiously awaited and so often heralded by patriotic writers of Great Britain.

For the rest of the concert, Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert meister, gave a very artistic performance of Mozart's D major violin concerto, which will soon be extinct, and which for the most part is very tiresome to hear. One can except the simple charm of the slow movement, and the beautiful second theme of the finale. Mr. Noack was applauded with justice, although he would have been much more warmly received had he played more interesting music.

The other orchestral pieces were the delightful overture to "The Magic Flute" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," which was not well played.

From Press Cleveland Ohio

Address

Date APR 1 1 1912

Last Symphony Concert

BY WILSON G. SMITH.

The Boston symphony brought the eleventh symphony course to a brilliant conclusion Wednesday night in one of the finest arranged and best interpreted programs we have ever had offered us. Besides being the final concert, it was Fiedler's last appearance as director, since he returns to Europe at the close of the season, Muck returning to his former post at the head of the Bostonians.

Fiedler's reception was most cordial and enthusiastic, the audience recalling him many times after the brilliant playing of the old war horse of conductors — Wagner's Tannhauser overture.

Fiedler certainly has no complaint to make concerning his treatment by American audiences, but, like other celebrated musicians, he hankers after the environment of Europe, where the artistic atmosphere is as thick as a London fog, and the compensation for artistic deeds is not altogether of monetary taint. Let us not forget, however, that American dollars possess a potent charm, and supply a comfortable concomitant in enjoying to its full the artistic fog alluded to.

The radiating rays from said Am. dollar would penetrate the gloom of the nether world. Wednesday's program was one of evolutionary character, the first part leading us through the evolution of the classic era—Haydn, Mozart, with the culminating genius of Beethoven as the highest altitude of symphonic development and inspirational achievement. Part two presented the apotheosis of modern creative thought in the two epoch-making works of Strauss and Wagner.

The Strauss tone poem—Life of a Hero—represents the most tremendous achievement in modern orchestration. Its almost uncanny mastery in the use of undreamed of technical resources; its prolixity in invention of themes and their stupendous development; the impressionistic massing of tonal colors; the volcanic piling of climax upon climax; the use of unrelated harmonies and dissonants with episodes of haunting melodies and brilliant-hued harmonic colors, are but a few of the characteristics that make one stand aghast at the possibilities of the conceptions of genius.

And yet, after all this wonder-inspiring combination of science and emotionalism, one can not but feel the real potency and glory of the saner classics of Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven.

One is forced to the conclusion that if the Life of a Hero involves so much strenuousness as Strauss depicts, a life of mediocrity has after all its charms and more quiet illusions.

To say that the Bostonians played magnificently is putting the matter in language trite and true. To make it a personal matter, I can recall no more perfect or inspiring occasion. The classics—like a breath from Elysium—were read with conservative emotionalism. Strauss and Wagner—like a maelstrom—swept over us with the horrific and imposing immensity of a tidal wave.

It was an artistic event of far-reaching memories, and formed a fitting climax to the most successful symphony season Cleveland has ever had.

POST,

APRIL 25, 1912

IMPORTANT CHANGES IN SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Mr. Fiedler has made several important changes in this week's Symphony programme, which will be played tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The regular programme will be preceded by the performance of the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which will be in memoriam of the victims of the Titanic disaster. It is at the request of a large number of patrons of the concerts that this has been done. The symphonic poem "Marsyas" of Mr. Shepherd will not be played, and in its stead has been placed the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner.

The programme as it now stands is the funeral march from the "Eroica," "A Faust Overture" and the "Siegfried Idyl" by Wagner; two pieces for viola and orchestra, (a) Chant Celtique by Forsyth, and (b) "Fantastic Dance" by Strube; three nocturnes by Debussy, and Salome's Dance from Richard Strauss's opera of the same name. The soloist will be Emile Ferir, principal viola of the orchestra, and in the third of the Debussy nocturnes the orchestra will have the assistance of 16 ladies from the Musical Art Club of Boston.

JOURNAL—

MAY 2, 1912.

Max Fiedler will make his farewell appearances as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. For his last program he has confined himself to well-tried favorites—Weber's "Oberon" overture, Brahms's C minor symphony No. 1, the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from the "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture, by Wagner.

[189]

Press-Democrat
Canton - Ohio
APR 12 1912

From Evening Repository Canton
Address Canton, Ohio
Date APR 12 1912

Boston Symphony Concert Premier Event of Season

A Boston program by a Boston orchestra is indeed a rarety for Canton, and such a rarety it is that it is doubtful if the majority of the audience that listened to the Boston Symphony orchestra in its magnificent program Thursday evening in the Auditorium got more real musical value out of it than out of two or three other organizations that have been here this season.

However, everyone agreed that the concert was delightful, and since everyone did agree, there's no cause for argument, for it was the most musical program by the most musical organization that has visited Canton this season, and perhaps in many preceding seasons.

It is rare indeed that the conductor of a musical body is accorded such a demonstration of enthusiasm at the conclusion of the final number of the program, as that which testified the appreciation of Max Fiedler's admirable conductorship and readings.

Notable features of the evening were the certain and confident attacks, the accuracy of the individual members of the orchestra, and the finished work of soloists, including that "meister of concertmeisters," A. Witek; harp, flute trio and the celesta, an instrument of pianoforte construction producing the tonal effect of the steel marimbaphone. The soloists were accorded much applause by the audience, which was attentive and exceptionally respectful and quiet during numbers.

An exhaustive description of the program would be superfluous in view of the bulky little program booklet issued weekly and containing complete descriptions of the orchestra's repertoire for the week. This is a feature other musical organizations would do well to adopt. It is a great source of convenience to the accustomed listener as well as to those less familiar with musical works in general.

The first was the Oberon overture (Weber), which is familiar to most music lovers, but it was given a sympathetic interpretation Thursday evening that would make it scarcely recognizable from the average hearing of it.

The big number of the entire program was the Tschaikowsky Symphony in B minor, in four parts. The chief service is from violins, but there is ample business for reed instruments. Violins take the opening, adagio movement, with a distant, dreamy effect, and are gradually reinforced by the reeds through the second and full movement of the first part. The effect is beautiful and indescribable, of course.

The finale, fourth part, returns to the sympathetic effect, with a splendid series of modulated harmonies, interchangeably carried by various parts of the orchestra and ending in a bright, positive conclusion.

The second Tschaikowsky number, third on the program, is a delightful descriptive suite, beautifully interpreted throughout with characteristic dance music descriptive of interpretative dances. It is a suite from the "Nutcracker" ballet music.

The Strauss number, fourth on the program, is unique. The effects are puzzling, and, according to Philip Hale's statement on the program, Richard Strauss admitted there was no description for its various motives that could be given clearly in English. Suffice it, the number tells the story of the condemnation of Till Eulenspiegel, a "Deutscher rogue," and what mischief isn't harmonized into musical form in the number, surely never could be expressed.

As a concluding number the orchestra gave Wagner's Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg, a typically Wagnerian introduction to the opera, and a work not unfamiliar to patrons of first class orchestral concerts. With plenty of brass and trumpet effect to add a grandioso, heroic color to the intricate, harmonious entanglements for stringed instruments, the prelude forms an appropriate and relieving manner of concluding such an excellent program as that given Thursday evening.

The success of the venture, and the gratification of the musical people of Canton, should be regarded as a fitting compliment to Miss Belle Adler, to whose efforts credit must be given for the Canton appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It may well be regarded as the event of the musical season.

Music-lovers, so-called, are not necessarily music critics. Music teachers are not necessarily music critics, for there are many persons instructing in technique who are not capable of being justly regarded as critics. The music listener, the person who has acquired skill through critical hearings of music, is best adapted to criticise and say what is or what is not good music, or what is a good musical organization.

Many people who cannot play or sing a note of music are good music critics. This is not hear-say; it is fact that the writer has had supported personally by some of the greatest artists before the world today.

No less a personage than Jean de Reske supported this contention, when in New York a few years ago he said:

"Because so-and-so says it is good music, and so-and-so happens to be of the elite, does not make it good music." Sounds a bit brusque coming from so polite a gentleman as de Reske, doesn't it?

Therefore, it may be agreed that the Canton audience that listened to the Boston Symphony orchestra Thursday evening did not pretend to appreciate it just because it was the Boston Symphony or because somebody said it was "going to be good." The audience appreciated it because the audience was composed of music listeners—the real critics. Also, there was almost a solid representation of Canton music teachers present.

Music, after all, is something of the soul, and not essentially of the pocket book or society tea party. Fortunately, it is something that is exclusive only to those who have talent, and cannot be made a social stone wall no matter how much some would so have it.

MAX FIEDLER SAYS ADIEU

Final Concert of Symphony Orchestra Marked by Demonstrations.

The final concert of the Symphony Orchestra last night when Max Fiedler made his last appearance as conductor was a repetition of the scenes at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. When Mr. Fiedler entered to begin the concert the applause which greeted him lasted over three minutes, and at the close of the Symphony which ended the first part of the program the entire audience rose to give evidence of its admiration for the retiring conductor. At the end of the concert there was more applause and wreaths were handed over the footlights.

In the mean time, during the intermission Mr. Fiedler took leave of the members of the orchestra. He expressed his sorrow at leaving Boston and told how thoroughly gratified he had been with the work done by the orchestra during the two years of his engagement. Incidentally he told the orchestra that he had been able to secure a considerable amount of money for its Pension Fund. In reply George Longy, solo oboe of the orchestra, in behalf of his colleagues, gave Mr. Fiedler a handsome

Boston Symphony Captivates On Its First Appearance Here

The Boston Symphony orchestra on its first appearance here held an audience of 2,000 people of Canton and nearby cities enthralled, Thursday night, in the Auditorium. Fascinated by the magic of the orchestra's capabilities, it gave to the musicians striking evidence of appreciation.

Each section of the unusual program was greeted wtih spontaneous applause. Max Fiedler, the conductor, was warmly received every time he turned to look the audience in the face, and when the last number had been finished the crowd recalled the director, after he had left the stage, cheered him while he bowed repeatedly, and was satisfied only when he motioned to the entire orchestra of 90, and had them stand and bow in answer to the applause.

Under Fiedler's leadership, the orchestra put a new meaning and melody into the program. The five numbers gave a wide range of opportunities to the organization, brought into prominence now the violins, now the wind instruments, now the harp or drums, but whatever was called upon maintained the same high standard of excellence. Fiedler showed a masterful power over his men. He was dignified yet with fire in his movements and with life in his baton.

PROGRAM VARIED.

The program, representative of the most varied types of music, in Tschaikowsky, Weber, Strauss and Wagner, was thoroughly enjoyable, especially since the audience was composed in great part of the music lovers of Canton and vicinity. They recognized the individual artists in the organization, and several times during the program Fiedler motioned to one, two or three players at a time to stand and bow, when he saw that their work was especially appreciated.

The program was opened with Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon." The overture began with a delicate note on the horn, representative in the opera, of the horn of Oberon, with flutes and clarinets quickly taking up the melody until the entire orchestra with a crashing cord, broke into the opening measures. A theme of clarinets and violins prevailed throughout, and the entire orchestra took part in the spirited finish.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, in B Minor, "Pathetic," followed the opening number. This was the most pretentious number on the program, and the magnificence of the composition made itself felt on the audience from the first notes. There was in this number, almost every sort of orchestral combination, and during the four movements the orchestra was given its greatest opportunity of the evening. At the close, so great was the applause that Fiedler was called back and back again, and even when he left the stage he was forced to acknowledge the plaudits.

After an intermission a second Tschaikowsky composition, a full orchestra selection from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker," was played. The composer here was found in a lighter mood. Delicate marches, beautiful dream waltzes, grotesque dances, and dances melodious, harmonic, and rythmic, made up the score.

INTRODUCES CELESTE.

Here was an example of the real Russian music, tuneful, hauntingly melodious. The "Danse Chinoise" from the score was loudly applauded. Short and grotesque, there was a strangeness about it which attracted at once. In the "Danse de la Fee-Dragee" a quaint strain was added through the use of the celeste, a keyboard instrument, in form like a piano, which produced an unusual tone. The player was forced to acknowledge applause at the close of the number. A similar strain was noticeable in the "Danse des Mirlitons," in which three wind instruments carried the melody. The three players as in the former case, were called upon to answer to applause. The "Nutcracker" ballet closed with a beautiful waltz theme.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned Roguish manner, in Rondo Form," followed on the program. Here the change was from the Russian to Strauss, the German. The prelude to Wagner's massive composition, "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," closed the program. Here the whole orchestra entered into the crashing strains, and put an interpretation upon the theme which brought the audience to its feet at the close, applauding loudly. Scarcely a dozen in the audience left the hall until Fiedler gave the players the sign to stand in a closing greeting.

The Boston symphony is one of the oldest permanent organizations of its sort in the country, and is at the end of its thirty-first season. It was organized by Henry L. Higginson, a wealthy Bostonian, who has backed it since its beginning. Almost from the first, it took a leading place among American orchestras and among those of the world.

FIEDLER'S LAST SEASON.

Conductor Fiedler, who is of the German school of musicians, is now in his fourth year with the orchestra and will leave at the close of the season to take up work in Europe. The organization will play Friday night in Grand Rapids, Saturday night in Detroit and then will leave for home. After its return there will be a few more concerts in Symphony hall, Boston, and the season will be closed.

The book-programs at the concert departed from the usual lines and were greatly appreciated by the audience. Accompanying each number there was an explanation of the form and interpretation of the music. This was accompanied by notes explanatory of the author's work and of that part of his life during which he wrote the particular number played.

The program fully outlined the theme and technical form of every one of the five numbers clearly, so that the audience was able much more intelligently to enter into the spirit of the music.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 25, 1912

New York and Mr. Fiedler

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its last appearance in New York in the present musical season Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was also Mr. Fiedler's last appearance in this city, as his engagement as conductor of the orchestra is ended with the close of the season in Boston next month. The matinée audience realized this fact, and conspicuously gave expression to its feelings of regret at his departure and of gratitude for what he has done for the New York musical public in the four years that he has been at the head of the orchestra. As at the evening concert on Thursday, he was greeted with a long continued applause when he appeared to take his place at the head of the orchestra; and at the close the listeners remained to applaud and to cheer for many minutes, recalling him again and again.

Finally Mr. Fiedler raised his hand for silence, and spoke in excellent English. He said that he could not "conduct his feelings" on that occasion so well as he could the orchestra, but he expressed his gratitude for the kindness that had been shown him in the four years during which he had been the director of the orchestra; said they had been four years of happiness for him, and hoped that the New York public would not forget him, as he would never forget the experiences he had had here, and closed with a heartfelt good-by. The tribute to him was sincere and well deserved, for Mr. Fiedler has kept the high standards of the orchestra and has maintained not only its material prosperity in New York, which could not be greater, but also the artistic value it has had to the most cultivated and fastidious music lovers of this city, and the place it has occupied in the very forefront of its musical activities. [The New York Times.

In the four seasons of his conductorship Mr. Fiedler has outgrown most of his undesirable peculiarities, while he has retained his force and his acumen. His conducting has found continually increasing favor, and that means that it has deserved it, for in the long run the musical public of this town is not to be deceived. Mr. Fiedler retires to give way to the conductor whom he succeeded, Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. Doubtless the German Empire will survive the loss, especially as we are sending back to it a greatly grown Fiedler. New York has enjoyed much good music under Mr. Fiedler's direction and will part with him with sorrow. And it will bless him in that he has left his matchless instrument behind him unimpaired. [The Sun.

[190]

From Evening Repository
Address Canton, Ohio
Date APR 12 1912

From News-Democrat
Address Canton - Ohio
Date APR 1 - 1912

Boston Symphony Concert Premier Event of Season

A Boston program by a Boston orchestra is indeed a rarety for Canton, and such a rarety it is that it is doubtful if the majority of the audience that listened to the Boston Symphony orchestra in its magnificent program Thursday evening in the Auditorium got more real musical value out of it than out of two or three other organizations that have been here this season.

However, everyone agreed that the concert was delightful, and since everyone did agree, there's no cause for argument, for it was the most musical program by the most musical organization that has visited Canton this season, and perhaps in many preceding seasons.

It is rare indeed that the conductor of a musical body is accorded such a demonstration of enthusiasm at the conclusion of the final number of the program, as that which testified the appreciation of Max Fiedler's admirable conductorship and readings.

Notable features of the evening were the certain and confident attacks, the accuracy of the individual members of the orchestra, and the finished work of soloists, including that "meister of concertmeisters," A. Witek; harp, flute trio and the celesta, an instrument of pianoforte construction producing the tonal effect of the steel marimbaphone. The soloists were accorded much applause by the audience, which was attentive and exceptionally respectful and quiet during numbers.

An exhaustive description of the program would be superfluous in view of the bulky little program booklet issued weekly and containing complete descriptions of the orchestra's repertoire for the week. This is a feature other musical organizations would do well to adopt. It is a great source of convenience to the accustomed listener as well as to those less familiar with musical works in general.

The first was the Oberon overture (Weber), which is familiar to most music lovers, but it was given a sympathetic interpretation Thursday evening that would make it scarcely recognizable from the average hearing of it.

The big number of the entire program was the Tschaikowsky Symphony in B minor, in four parts. The chief service is from violins, but there is ample business for reed instruments. Violins take the opening, adagio movement, with a distant, dreamy effect, and are gradually reinforced by the reeds through the second and full movement of the first part. The effect is beautiful and indescribable, of course.

The finale, fourth part, returns to the sympathetic effect, with a splendid series of modulated harmonies, interchangeably carried by various parts of the orchestra and ending in a bright, positive conclusion.

The second Tschaikowsky number, third on the program, is a delightful descriptive suite, beautifully interpreted throughout with characteristic dance music descriptive of interpretative dances. It is a suite from the "Nutcracker" ballet music.

The Strauss number, fourth on the program, is unique. The effects are puzzling, and, according to Philip Hale's statement on the program, Richard Strauss admitted there was no description for its various motives that could be given clearly in English. Suffice it, the number tells the story of the condemnation of Till Eulenspiegel, a "Deutscher rogue," and what mischief isn't harmonized into musical form in the number, surely never could be expressed.

As a concluding number the orchestra gave Wagner's Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg, a typically Wagnerian introduction to the opera, and a work not unfamiliar to patrons of first class orchestral concerts. With plenty of brass and trumpet effect to add a grandioso, heroic color to the intricate, harmonious entanglements for stringed instruments, the prelude forms an appropriate and relieving manner of concluding such an excellent program as that given Thursday evening.

The success of the venture, and the gratification of the musical people of Canton, should be regarded as a fitting compliment to Miss Belle Adler, to whose efforts credit must be given for the Canton appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It may well be regarded as the event of the musical season.

Music-lovers, so-called, are not necessarily music critics. Music teachers are not necessarily music critics, for there are many persons instructing in technique who are not capable of being justly regarded as critics. The music listener, the person who has acquired skill through critical hearings of music, is best adapted to criticise and say what is or what is not good music, or what is a good musical organization.

Many people who cannot play or sing a note of music are good music critics. This is not hear-say; it is fact that the writer has had supported personally by some of the greatest artists before the world today.

No less a personage than Jean de Reske supported this contention, when in New York a few years ago he said:

"Because so-and-so says it is good music, and so-and-so happens to be of the elite, does not make it good music." Sounds a bit brusque coming from so polite a gentleman as de Reske, doesn't it?

Therefore, it may be agreed that the Canton audience that listened to the Boston Symphony orchestra Thursday evening did not pretend to appreciate it just because it was the Boston Symphony or because somebody said it was "going to be good." The audience appreciated it because the audience was composed of music listeners—the real critics. Also, there was almost a solid representation of Canton music teachers present.

Music, after all, is something of the soul, and not essentially of the pocket book or society tea party. Fortunately, it is something that is exclusive only to those who have talent, and cannot be made a social stone wall no matter how much some would so have it.

MAX FIEDLER SAYS ADIEU

Final Concert of Symphony Orchestra Marked by Demonstrations.

The final concert of the Symphony Orchestra last night when Max Fiedler made his last appearance as conductor was a repetition of the scenes at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. When Mr. Fiedler entered to begin the concert the applause which greeted him lasted over three minutes, and at the close of the Symphony which ended the first part of the program the entire audience rose to give evidence of its admiration for the retiring conductor. At the end of the concert there was more applause and wreaths were handed over the footlights.

In the mean time, during the intermission Mr. Fiedler took leave of the members of the orchestra. He expressed his sorrow at leaving Boston and told how thoroughly gratified he had been with the work done by the orchestra during the two years of his engagement. Incidentally he told the orchestra that he had been able to secure a considerable amount of money for its Pension Fund. In reply George Longy, solo oboe of the orchestra, in behalf of his colleagues, gave Mr. Fiedler a handsome [illegible]

From Evening Repository
Address Canton, Ohio
Date APR 12 1912

Boston Symphony Captivates On Its First Appearance Here

The Boston Symphony orchestra on its first appearance here held an audience of 2,000 people of Canton and nearby cities enthralled, Thursday night, in the Auditorium. Fascinated by the magic of the orchestra's capabilities, it gave to the musicians striking evidence of appreciation.

Each section of the unusual program was greeted wtih spontaneous applause, Max Fiedler, the conductor, was warmly received every time he turned to look the audience in the face, and when the last number had been finished the crowd recalled the director, after he had left the stage, cheered him while he bowed repeatedly, and was satisfied only when he motioned to the entire orchestra of 90, and had them stand and bow in answer to the applause.

Under Fiedler's leadership, the orchestra put a new meaning and melody into the program. The five numbers gave a wide range of opportunities to the organization, brought into prominence now the violins, now the wind instruments, now the harp or drums, but whatever was called upon maintained the same high standard of excellence. Fiedler showed a masterful power over his men. He was dignified yet with fire in his movements and with life in his baton.

PROGRAM VARIED.

The program, representative of the most varied types of music, in Tschaikowsky, Weber, Strauss and Wagner, was thoroughly enjoyable, especially since the audience was composed in great part of the music lovers of Canton and vicinity. They recognized the individual artists in the organization, and several times during the program Fiedler motioned to one, two or three players at a time to stand and bow, when he saw that their work was especially appreciated.

The program was opened with Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon." The overture began with a delicate note on the horn, representative in the opera, of the horn of Oberon, with flutes and clarinets quickly taking up the melody until the entire orchestra with a crashing cord, broke into the opening measures. A theme of clarinets and violins prevailed throughout, and the entire orchestra took part in the spirited finish.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, in B Minor, "Pathetic," followed the opening number. This was the most pretentious number on the program, and the magnificence of the composition made itself felt on the audience from the first notes. There was in this number, almost every sort of orchestral combination, and during the four movements the orchestra was given its greatest opportunity of the evening. At the close, so great was the applause that Fiedler was called back and back again, and even when he left the stage he was forced to acknowledge the plaudits.

After an intermission a second Tschaikowsky composition, a full orchestra selection from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker," was played. The composer here was found in a lighter mood. Delicate marches, beautiful dream waltzes, grotesque dances, and dances melodious, harmonic, and rythmic, made up the score.

INTRODUCES CELESTE.

Here was an example of the real Russian music, tuneful, hauntingly melodious. The "Danse Chinoise" from the score was loudly applauded. Short and grotesque, there was a strangeness about it which attracted at once. In the "Danse de la Fee-Dragee" a quaint strain was added through the use of the celeste, a keyboard instrument, in form like a piano, which produced an unusual tone. The player was forced to acknowledge applause at the close of the number. A similar strain was noticeable in the "Danse des Mirilitons," in which three wind instruments carried the melody. The three players as in the former case, were called upon to answer to applause. The "Nutcracker" ballet closed with a beautiful waltz theme.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned Roguish manner, in Rondo Form," followed on the program. Here the change was from the Russian to Strauss, the German. The prelude to Wagner's massive composition, "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," closed the program. Here the whole orchestra entered into the crashing strains, and put an interpretation upon the theme which brought the audience to its feet at the close, applauding loudly. Scarcely a dozen in the audience left the hall until Fiedler gave the players the sign to stand in a closing greeting.

The Boston symphony is one of the oldest permanent organizations of its sort in the country, and is at the end of its thirty-first season. It was organized by Henry L. Higginson, a wealthy Bostonian, who has backed it since its beginning. Almost from the first, it took a leading place among American orchestras and among those of the world.

FIEDLER'S LAST SEASON.

Conductor Fiedler, who is of the German school of musicians, is now in his fourth year with the orchestrr and will leave at the close of the season to take up work in Europe. The organization will play Friday night in Grand Rapids, Saturday night in Detroit and then will leave for home. After its return there will be a few more concerts in Symphony hall, Boston, and the season will be closed.

The book-programs at the concert departed from the usual lines and were greatly appreciated by the audience. Accompanying each number there was an explanation of the form and interpretation of the music. This was accompanied by notes explanatory of the author's work and of that part of his life during which he wrote the particular number played.

The program fully outlined the theme and technical form of every one of the five numbers clearly, so that the audience was able much more intelligently to enter into the spirit of the music.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 25, 1912

New York and Mr. Fiedler

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its last appearance in New York in the present musical season Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was also Mr. Fiedler's last appearance in this city, as his engagement as conductor of the orchestra is ended with the close of the season in Boston next month. The matinée audience realized this fact, and conspicuously gave expression to its feelings of regret at his departure and of gratitude for what he has done for the New York musical public in the four years that he has been at the head of the orchestra. As at the evening concert on Thursday, he was greeted with a long continued applause when he appeared to take his place at the head of the orchestra; and at the close the listeners remained to applaud and to cheer for many minutes, recalling him again and again.

Finally Mr. Fiedler raised his hand for silence, and spoke in excellent English. He said that he could not "conduct his feelings" on that occasion so well as he could the orchestra, but he expressed his gratitude for the kindness that had been shown him in the four years during which he had been the director of the orchestra; said they had been four years of happiness for him, and hoped that the New York public would not forget him, as he would never forget the experiences he had had here, and closed with a heartfelt good-by. The tribute to him was sincere and well deserved, for Mr. Fiedler has kept the high standards of the orchestra and has maintained not only its material prosperity in New York, which could not be greater, but also the artistic value it has had to the most cultivated and fastidious music lovers of this city, and the place it has occupied in the very forefront of its musical activities. [The New York Times.

In the four seasons of his conductorship Mr. Fiedler has outgrown most of his undesirable peculiarities, while he has retained his force and his acumen. His conducting has found continually increasing favor, and that means that it has deserved it, for in the long run the musical public of this town is not to be deceived. Mr. Fiedler retires to give way to the conductor whom he succeeded, Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin. Doubtless the German Empire will survive the loss, especially as we are sending back to it a greatly grown Fiedler. New York has enjoyed much good music under Mr. Fiedler's direction and will part with him with sorrow. And it will bless him in that he has left his matchless instrument behind him unimpaired. [The Sun.

[196]

JOURNAL,
APRIL 10, 1912

LONDON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT HERE

A Small But Enthusiastic Audience Gives Nikisch Warm Greeting.

The audience that greeted Arthur Nikisch and the London Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall last night was more remarkable for its enthusiasm than for its numbers. The balconies were crowded. But it was unexpected to see the foremost conductor of the day return at the head of the first noted European orchestra to cross the Atlantic and face row upon row of empty seats in a hall regularly occupied by the orchestra to whom he gave its pristine brilliance. And those who attended seemed to feel this and did their utmost to make their applause seem as cordial and complimentary as possible.

It was a memorable affair. An audience trying to be as cheerful as it could after dodging the drizzle outside found that there were no programs except those to be had for a consideration, and these were illustrated, not only with pictures of the visitors from abroad, but of the various promoters of this unique enterprise, and with notes on their several achievements. There was also a list of New York subscribers.

But the audience made the best of it all and applauded every number on the program with right hearty good will. There were four numbers, the third, "Leonora" overture by Beethoven, the first Brahm symphony, Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Francesca di Rimini," and Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture; and the finale of the symphony and the Tschaikowsky tone poem, were indeed deserving of all the enthusiasm that could be mustered. The masterpiece was the performance of the work in which the best known of the Russian composer has pictured the fate of the lovers whom Dante found tossing about in the infernal whirlwind. Here Nikisch led the orchestra to sublime heights.

The strings of the orchestra produce a very large body of tone, with perhaps the finest instruments used in orchestral concerts anywhere. The weakness of the London band is in the wood wind; and it may also be remarked that when the brasses were urged to let go in the Wagner overture there was little room left for the remainder of the music.

Nikisch and the premier British orchestra will give a final matinee performance at Symphony Hall on Saturday, April 27.

From TIMES
Address Buffalo, N. Y.
Date APR 10 1912

MAX FIEDLER MADE FINAL BOW BEFORE LOCAL MUSIC LOVERS

Last night marked an era in musical events, being the farewell appearance of Max Fiedler, one of the most efficient conductors that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had. Mr. Fiedler was warmly greeted on his entrance. This was the last in the series of concerts given this season under the management of Mrs. Mai Smith and the size of the audience testified that there has been no waning of the interest.

The program in its entirety was the overture to the opera "Oberon," Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Eroica Op. 55 by Beethoven, Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello with orchestral accompaniment, op. 33 by Tschaikowsky, Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Praks by Strauss, Waldweban from Wagner's Siegfried and The Ride of the Valkyries from The Valkyrie by Wagner. These selections have not been heard before this season and were listened to with much interest.

The length of the Beethoven symphony detracted from the enjoyment of the latter part of the program so that the humorous Strauss music depicting the merry pranks of the rogue Eulenspiegel and the delightful bird music of Waldweben could not entirely dispel the restlessness. The spirited "Ride of the Valkyrie" was given with such dash and brilliancy that it evoked a storm of applause.

To give due praise to such a perfect organization is well-nigh impossible. Each section of the orchestra vies with every other in its tonal quality, its finished technic and its control of nuances. It is to be regretted that Mr. Fiedler leaves America to take up important work in Berlin, as he is one of the most able conductors in this country.

The soloist was Alwin Schroeder, the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who played Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme. Mr. Schroeder drew a full, rich tone from his instrument and exhibited admirable technic both in the clearness of the rapid passages and in the smoothness of the sustained ones.

ENQUIRER,
From
Address San Francisco, Cal.
Date APR 10 1912

LAST APPEARANCE OF MAX FIEDLER

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Under Great Leader, Was Heard by Large Crowd.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard for the second time this season in Buffalo in Convention hall last evening. The usual capacity crowd attended, and the affair was made the more notable by the fact that this will be the last appearance here of Max Fiedler, under whose able direction the organization has developed to its present degree of perfection. The enthusiasm with which the conductor was received and the manner in which his stand was decorated showed the great esteem in which Mr. Fiedler is held by his Buffalo friends..

Mr. Fiedler was at his best last evening; his readings were masterful and pregnant with that power which has won him admiration and sincere respect in the musical world of this country. He was given a most enthusiastic reception, and each number was applauded for an encore.

The programme opened with the delightful overture to "Oberon," by Weber. This was followed by numbers from Beethoven, Strauss, Wagner and Tschaikowsky. Wagner's "The Ride of the Valkryries" concluded the programme.

The exquisite beauty of tone of the orchestra was commented on more than usual last evening.

It was in the symphony that the marvelous work of the men aroused most wonder. Some of the masterpieces were played with such wonderful conception, sweetness of tone and excess of feeling, that the emotions of the listeners were stirred to the depths.

Alwin Schroeder, the famous cellist, was the soloist and his playing of the Tschaikowsky composition was nothing less than marvelous. He was warmly recalled several times.

From
Address
Date APR 13 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, entertained a packed house last night at Powers' theater. The concert opened with Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon," which was accorded a spirited and comprehensive reading. The answer of the muted strings to the horn of Oberon in the introductory passages, was particularly impressive, terminating as it did in the full orchestral crashing chord. The applause accorded this first number was wild and enthusiastic. Mr. Fiedler wielded an extra long baton and read from a flat table.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was played in all its majesty. The introduction, allegretto and presto movements all worked up steadily and surely to the finale, which is a wild rondo on two themes, "expressing exuberant joy; joy that becomes orgiastic." This number received an ovation. The Debussy number, the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," was insuperable caprice, almost madness in conception of music by the contemporary French composer. Here is the weaving of a fantastic fabric by the wood-winds and the harp, with manifold nuances of color and tone combinations, truly marvelous.

The Strauss descriptive piece, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"—bespeaking the exploits of one hero of fifteenth century German folklore—is a tone-poem treated magnificently. Strauss kills "Till" on the scaffold, in his composition, which is told by a descending leap in the brass, impressive and striking. The last two numbers were both Wagnerian. The prelude to the opera "Lohengrin," with its gradual development on a single theme and its final ascent to an almost ethereal close, elicited great applause, as did the concluding number, prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg"—a truly stupendous achievement, both in conception and execution, which excited the audience to an unusual demonstration, for Grand Rapids. Cries of "Bravo!" were actually heard and handkerchiefs fluttered in the air.

In his reading, throughout the entire program, Mr. Fiedler brought out the grandeur and musical worth of each number. It is a feat hard to appreciate, this centralizing of an immense body of players that the effect may be as a personal interpretation in perfect unison. Mr. Fiedler has been said to lack poetry, sympathy and close touch, yet his performance last night would tend to establish his unusual ability as a conductor.

[197]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Gazette Times Pittsburg Pa
Address
Date APR 9 - 1912

Max Fiedler Scores a Personal Triumph

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Last Concert of Pittsburgh Orchestra Series.

By THEODORE RENTZ.

The last concert in this season's series of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association was given last night in Soldiers' Memorial Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor.

While not so large as that which listened to this matchless organization last year, the audience was the banner one of this year's series, and comfortably filled the large auditorium. Mr. Fiedler scored a personal triumph at his farewell appearance in this city as the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the appreciation of the playing of these artists was voiced in no uncertain manner.

In the excellence of its personnel this orchestra is unparalleled, and the oft' repeated assertion that it is the finest orchestral body in the world is perhaps not without justification. The tonal quality of the different sections, which are uniformly perfect, is an unalloyed delight. The mellow reeds, the sonorous brass, which is never forced to a point of harshness, even in the exacting climaxes of a Strauss tone poem, the smoothness and clarity of the strings in combination are well nigh perfection. It is to be regretted that Pittsburgh seems destined not to hear the organization in its entirety, the string section last night being the smallest of any of the orchestras that have visited us this year, and though this lack of balance was not noticed in the symphony, it was apparent in the Strauss number and in the Tannhauser overture, when the strings at times were almost overpowered.

The choice of the program was a particularly happy one. Though it contained nothing new, the interest was sustained throughout the evening. The "Egmont" overture received a dignified if not a particularly spirited reading. The Schubert B minor "Unfinished" symphony, an ever welcome favorite, furnished the orchestra with opportunities to display its beautiful tone quality. The clarinet and oboe sang the tender theme in the first movement with poetic beauty, the soft sustained chords in the wood-winds were perfect in intonation; the whole work was an undisturbed flow of exquisite melody. Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" was heard in this city some years ago under the personal conductorship of the composer. It requires but little imagination to follow this musical portrayal, its story being clearly set forth in dramatic episodes and passages of emotional splendor. Its performance taxes the resources of the entire orchestra, and it was given last night with unrivalled virtuosity. Mr. Fiedler read the work with a true insight of its content. Two Wagner numbers, prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture met with their usual hearty reception and closed a most enjoyable program.

Alwin Schroeder, first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist of the program. He contributed Tchaikowsky's variations on a Rococo theme for violincello and orchestral accompaniment. The artist displayed an ample technique, a warm, beautiful tone, and gave the composition a finished musical interpretation. The performance was a most satisfactory one and it met with a reception that amounted to an ovation for the performer. He was recalled many times, but did not respond.

POST, APRIL 21, 1912

People's Choral Union

At the concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, April 28, by the People's Choral Union, 400 voices, Frederick W. Wodell, conductor, the first three numbers of the "Stabat Mater" by Dvorak will be given, for the first time in this city for a number of years. These comprise a chorus, with obligato quartet, a quartet with orchestral accompaniment, and a concluding choral piece. Parts I. and II. of "The Creation" will form the concluding portion of the programme. The solo singers are Mrs. Grace Bonner Williams, Miss Florence Jepperson, Mr. Howard E. Pratt, and Mr. Leverett S. Merrill.

THE POPS

But two more weeks remain of the Symphony season of 1911-1912. On Monday morning, May 6, Symphony Hall will be cleared of its formal seats, which will be replaced by the familiar tables and chairs and that evening the 27th season of Pop concerts will begin. This year they will run but eight weeks instead of the usual nine, for the Symphony season was prolonged an extra week by a second Western trip. The closing night of the Pops will be on Saturday, June 29. As has been the rule for the last two years, the conducting will be divided equally between Gustav Strube and Andre Maquarre. Mr. Strube will conduct the first four weeks and Mr. Maquarre the second. Both of them have been diligently searching for new material and some attractive novelties are promised. The orchestra, as usual, will number 55 members and the prices will be the same as they have been in past years.

Symphony Conc[illegible]

The 23d and last but one [illegible]gramme of the Symphony concerts of [illegible]t Friday afternoon and Saturday [illegible]ening, like the 22d, will have no symp[illegible]y on it. For the first time in several [illegible]ears Mr. Emile Ferir, the admired pr[illegible]pal viola player of the orchestra, will a[illegible]ar as soloist. Mr. Ferir is one of the s[illegible]t artists of the orchestra. He will p[illegible] two pieces, one a "Chant Celique," wr[illegible]ten for him by the English compose[illegible] Cecil Forsyth, and the other Gusta[illegible] Strube's "Fantastic Dance," which wa[illegible] also written for him.

The feature of the programme will b[illegible] the first performance in Boston of "Sa[illegible]ome's Dance," from Richard Straus[illegible] opera of that name.

Another novelty will be a Sympho[illegible] Idyll entitled "Marsyas," by Ar[illegible]r Shepherd, one of the younger Amer[illegible]n composers. The other numbers wil[illegible]e Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and t[illegible]e Nocturnes of Debussy. In the last [illegible]- turne the chorus of Sirens will be [illegible]g by the ladies of the Musical Art Clu[illegible]f Boston.

The "Dance of Salome" is a rema[illegible] ble instrumental synopsis, so to sp[illegible] of the whole drama, and a wonde[illegible] symphonic development of all of its [illegible] lient themes. Mr. Shepherd, who n[illegible] teaches counterpoint at the New Eng[illegible]land Conservatory of Music, has written a symphonic poem for full modern orchestra after the well-known legend of Marsyas, the discoverer of Minerva's flute, who entered, to his own undoing, into a contest of skill with Apollo. There is a pastoral preluding in the Phrygian mode and the episode of the contest is effectively introduced by bold passages for the harp and the solo instrument.

Symphony in Cambridge

The eighth and last Symphony concert of the season in Cambridge will [illegible] as soloist Miss Irma [illegible] of the Symphony Orchestra who has made remarkably rapid progress in her art and has played with much success in this city. She will play Wieniawski's Concerto in D-Minor. The symphony will be Brahms' in D-Major No. 2, and the last number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "A Hero Life."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Chronicle Telegraph
Address
Date APR 9 191

Glowing Tribute Paid To Director Fiedler

Capacity Audience Hears Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Under Clever Leader.

FINE PROGRAM IS RENDERED

With the concert given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Memorial Hall, the winter series of symphony performances under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association was brought to a brilliant close. The event brought out an audience which almost filled the great hall, a fact that may be interpreted as evidencing the desire of the musical public in Pittsburgh to second the wonderful farewell tribute paid to Director Fiedler at his closing concert in Boston, which city he is about to leave in order to resume his activities in Europe. There can be no question as to the profound impression which Mr. Fiedler has made in Pittsburgh, the rare quality of his work, both as an interpreter of scores and in the training and handling of his men, meeting with manifest understanding and appreciation here. Were the question put to a vote, this city would doubtless confirm the verdict pronounced by more than one authority of the first rank to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Fiedler has reached the first place among the orchestras of the world.

With one exception, the numbers making up last night's program are familiar to local concertgoers, but they were none the less enjoyed, new interest being lent to them by the exquisite perfection of their performance. This, too, in spite of the fact that in making up the orchestra for the road, the balance was a trifle upset, the woodwind, for example, being stronger than either division of the violins. Four bassoons and seven other reeds against two horns, a combination presented in the symphony, may be set down as rather unusual. It was only in the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," however, that the inequality was at all noticeable. This work, with its demands for bizarre effects, taxes to the limit the powers of the full orchestra and consequently, in his interpretation of it, Mr. Fiedler found himself with a task of double difficulty on his hands. That he came through it with credit bears witness to his excellent generalship.

Beethoven's well known "Egmont" overture, which opened the program, was followed by the ever fascinating "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, to which a flawless rendering was given. Often as this work has been done in Pittsburgh by first-class orchestras, it is doubtful that it has ever before been given here with such delicate refinement and perfection of detail. A great lesson in interpretation may be learned from Mr. Fiedler's reading of this fairy-like poesy done into musical tones and from the manner in which his orchestra responds.

In the second part, Alwin Schroeder, the leading 'cellist of the orchestra, appeared as soloist, playing Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello and Orchestra." These variations are intensely interesting. They were written for Fitzenhagen, one of the greatest 'cellists of his day, and in their elaboration, the composer found means of bringing out practically all the powers of the solo instrument. The orchestration which he provides is peculiar and is so utilized as to give to the accompaniment a distinctively Slavonic twang. Mr. Schroeder played the work with satisfying smoothness and with just enough of that magical quality known as "temperament" to win the heart of his auditory. He was encored repeatedly.

Two Wagnerian numbers, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture, both nobly done, rounded out the program. At the close, the audience applauded long and loudly. It was Pittsburgh's "godspeed" to a great leader, and it came from the heart.

HERALD,
APRIL 28, 1912.

PROGRAM CHANGED

On account of the sudden sickness of Mr. Ferir, who played viola solos Friday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the program of the concert last night was changed, and was as follows: Beethoven, funeral march from the "Eroica" symphony; Wagner, Faust overture and Siegfried Idyl; Strauss, Salome's dance; Debussy, Three Nocturnes; Berlioz, overture, "Roman Carnival." Mr. Ferir is suffering from tonsilitis and should not have played on Friday, although his performance was admirable and excited hearty applause.

From Evening Press
Address Grand Rapids Mich
Date APR 13 1912

Boston Symphony Concert

The richest of musical fare was placed before a capacity audience at Powers' theater by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. And the feast was so well served that after it was all over the delighted auditors held to their seats and applauded and applauded and applauded.

The program arranged for Grand Rapids was of the highest caliber and it was splendidly rendered. The great orchestra of more than sixty musicians played under the direction of Max Fiedler as if inspired. Faultless in execution its work was filled with that temperamental enthusiasm that distinguishes the accomplishments of the artist from the efforts of the mere performer.

The beautiful overture to Weber's opera, "Oberon," served as an excellent appetizer for what was to follow. It was rendered with a mastery that brought out all its beauties.

The great feature of the evening was Beethoven's symphony in A major, No. 7, which was interpreted with a spirit and an understanding that carried rare pleasure to the ears while its melodies charmed the soul.

Two striking novelties on the program were Debussy's ultra-modern prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss' sprightly, merry rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The rendition of this latter number was marked by a succession of unique musical effects. All departments of the orchestra were called into play in this and all responded with telling effect.

The prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" was beautifully done. Every note of it was filled with tonal charm, from the pianissimo opening of the violins through the swelling crescendo up to the splendid climax with the whole orchestra in one grand burst of harmony. The concert ended with the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," which was done with the sonorous strength that makes the music of Wagner so impressive.

Max Fiedler displayed masterly ability as a conductor, having all departments of the orchestra under his close control at all times and seeming to sway the musicians with his own musical emotions. The audience gave both conductor and orchestra a striking ovation at the close of the concert.

Arthur W. Stace.

From Dispatch
Address Pittsburg Pa
Date APR 7 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAS ENTHUSIASTIC AUDIENCE

The "Unfinished" by Schubert, With Its Appealing Melodies, Is Greatly Enjoyed

By PAUL K. HARPER.

The last of the series of concerts by visiting symphony orchestras arranged by the Pittsburg Orchestral Association took place last evening in Soldiers' Memorial Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, was presented. The program was one of the most interesting and thoroughly enjoyable of the season and the audience one of the largest and most enthusiastic. The "Overture to Egmont," by Beethoven, was used to open the program. The powerful reading given the mighty work aroused enthusiasm and gave the keenest pleasure. The symphony was the "B Minor," by Franz Schubert, more familiarly known as the "Unfinished," and was given an admirable rendition, eminently satisfactory in every respect. The mellow 'cello passages were most agreeably given.

"Death and Transfiguration," the majestic tone poem by Richard Strauss, is "program" music of the most emphatic description, and is almost morbidly typical of the none too pleasant subject. The wonderful artistry of the man cannot be denied, but the almost brutal directness of the allegro molto agitato is to an extent depressing. The authoritative reading of the work went far to make it impressive and appreciated. The "Prelude" to Richard Wagner's "Lohengrin" was given with fine effect, especially the opening portion by the violins. The "Overture to Tannhauser" is always sure of a warm welcome, and last evening was no exception to the rule.

The soloist was Alwin Schroeder, the principal 'cellist of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder played "Variations on a Rococo Theme," by Tschaikowsky. The technical difficulties which the soloist surmounted were a wonder to many who were not familiar with the possibilities of this wonderful instrument, which takes on new beauties in the hands of so finished an artist as Mr. Schroeder undoubtedly is.

About Concerts

MR. Fiedler has ordered as follows the programme of the final pair of Symphony Concerts on May 3 and 4, at which he will end his term as the conductor of the orchestra:

Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor ..... Brahms
Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan"—Siegfried's Apotheosis from "Götterdämmerung" — Prelude to "Lohengrin"—Overture to "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

Mr. Shepherd's new piece, "Marsyas," has been dropped from the programme of the Symphony Concerts for this week. In its stead Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the second movement of Beethoven's "Eriocа" symphony will be played—the latter to the memory of those lost on the Titanic. It will begin what promises to be an exceptionally long concert.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 24, 1912

THE BOSTON GLOBE—TUESDAY, MAY 7, 1912.

"THE POPS" HERE AGAIN FOR LONG STAY.

Conductor Strube and His Players Give Pleasing Program And Receive Overwhelming Applause.

THE OPENING NIGHT OF "THE POPS" AS SEEN BY THE GLOBE ARTIST.

"The Pops" arrived last night for a prolonged stay at Symphony Hall.

"The Pops" are an institution invented primarily for the benefit of those delicately organized persons whose digestions will not permit them to listen to symphonic music unless they dilute it with a pretzel, a lemonade or perchance a bottle of "Goetterdaemmerung" with a cherry on top.

To those who cannot take music straight without experiencing dire postprandial distress, "the pops" are urgently recommended by the best physicians and caterers.

The first night of the Pops is an occasion of great musical and social significance. The Symphony Orchestra has been busy rehearsing and giving concerts throughout the Winter for this event, when 55 picked men are allowed to play as a reward of merit.

Heretofore Mr Strube has recognized the occasion by composing a march to be unveiled at this time for the first time anywhere. Last night he turned his muse to sighs rather than to bugle blasts, and later in the evening brought forward a number modestly called "Serenade," but enthusiastically redemanded.

It being unfortunately too late for critical opinion upon Mr Strube's piece, it may be said that the only defect with it was that people listened too intently to be able to eat and drink at the same time.

Whereas the weather lessened the brilliance of the evening with regard to the display in gowns and millinery, customarily a principal adjunct of the entertainment, distinguished femininity was not absent from the program.

"The Queen of Sheba," according to Gounod, headed an august procession, to be followed by the "Merry Wives of Windsor," they in turn making way for the "Girls of Baden." The famous air of Delilah was heard in the second group together with other music associated with her services in the cause of Dagon, and finally the "Pink Lady" was remembered by a selection.

The program did not state that the prelude to Act 3 of Wolf-Ferrari's "The Jewels of the Madonna" was heard for the first time in Boston. This is an opera now familiar in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, Minneapolis and perhaps in other Western cities.

It discloses no striking or novel devices in invention, harmonic or orchestral treatment. Waltz rhythm is ingratiatingly prominent and there are definite and suave melodic lines. The effect of this excerpt out of its operatic sequence and context is necessarily limited, but for its own sake, this music was altogether pleasing.

As a warning let it be added that the member of the battery department who places in view the placards bearing the program numbers of the pieces to be played, was diligently coached by the audience in his share of the performance. After the appearance of the benevolent legend "Extra," Mr Strube began Handel's "Largo" with Mr. Marshall at the organ and Mr Hoffman playing the solo. At the conclusion of the steadily mounting climax with the full strings and the magnificent organ, the audience burst into overwhelming applause.

Mr Strube took his place as though for an encore, when the "Extra" disappeared, leaving "9" in its place. The applause immediately burst forth and continued until the "extra" card, again removed, went back to stay, and the repeat of the number was played.

The program tonight will be as follows:

March from Damnation of Faust.....Berlioz
Overture, The Barber of Seville.....Rossini
Waltz, Die Fledermaus.....Strauss
Carnaval Venetien.....Burgmein
(a) Florinde, (b) Rosaura, (c) Columbine, (d) Arlequin
Selection, Carmen.....Bizet
Two movements from The Nut-Cracker Suite.....Tschaikowsky
(a) Danse de Mirlitons, (b) Danse Russe Trepak.
Prelude to Lohengrin.....Wagner
Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
March, Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Organ, Mr Marshall.
Meditation from Thais.....Massenet
Solo violin, Mr J. Hoffmann.
Selection, The Siren.....Fall
March, Mit Standarten.....Blon

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 6, 1912

The Final Rites for Mr. Fiedler

CONTRARY to expectation, the public of Saturday evening at the Symphony Concerts parted still more cordially with Mr. Fiedler than did the public of Friday afternoon. There are many more men in the audiences of Saturday, and thus applause gains in volume, accent, and staying power. The concert was, moreover, the end of the series for the year and of Mr. Fiedler's term as conductor. It had its little rites, like the bunch of roses that awaited him, when he came to his place; like the big wreaths of laurel, tied with the German colors, that were handed to him at the end of the concert, like the tall silver vase, austere of line and reticent in its inscription, that the orchestra gave to him in the intermission for memory of their four years of work together. The leave-taking of Friday seemed a mere preliminary beside these formalities, and the applause that the conductor received then was tame indeed beside the plaudits that followed him through the concert of Saturday. The impression has been that the audiences of the afternoon liked Mr. Fiedler more generally and warmly than did the audiences of the evenings. The incidents of Saturday belied the impression—or else were the exception that proved the rule. Anyhow, to the end the audience kept its wonted discrimination. For it more applauded Mr. Fiedler at the end of Brahms's symphony in C minor, wherein he had blended the tonal and the expressive virtues, insight, imagination and emotion to revealing and thrilling outcome, than it did at the end of his excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas.

Had the occasion been a political convention instead of a symphony concert, the attendant reporters would probably have timed the aplause that greeted Mr. Fiedler when he first appeared. It continued surprisingly long, so that it rose and fell, gathered itself again, mounted anew and held the conductor, as it seemed for four or five minutes with bent and acknowledging head. It was quick and hearty at the end of the overture to "Oberon" and at each pause in Brahms's symphony. When it was done, by a common accord, almost the whole audience rose to its feet, recalled the conductor once, twice and thrice, and volleyed its applause at him and the standing orchestra. The pieces from Wagner came and went to due measure of applause, and then, at the end of the concert, when the wreaths were borne up the aisle, everyone stood before and behind the conductor and stilled the plaudits only when he lifted his hand to speak. His little speech was much like that of Friday afternoon, though less clearly spoken because Mr. Fiedler was plainly much more moved. Such emotion may reasonably excuse a somewhat tactless allusion to the circumstances of his departure and the possibility of return. Mr. Fiedler has served his term with honor to himself, with satisfaction to his public, with due devotion to the standards of the orchestra and the concerts. It ends according to the conditions originally and clearly determined for it. There is no more to be said. The speech ended; the applause swelled once more; the stage and the auditorium quickly emptied. The leave-taking was done, and it had added speech-making by the departing conductor to the customs of the Symphony Concerts.

H. T. P.

[192]

From Evening Press.

Address Grand Rapids Mich.

Date APR 13 1912

Boston Symphony Concert

The richest of musical fare was placed before a capacity audience at Powers' theater by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. And the feast was so well served that after it was all over the delighted auditors held to their seats and applauded and applauded and applauded.

The program arranged for Grand Rapids was of the highest caliber and it was splendidly rendered. The great orchestra of more than sixty musicians played under the direction of Max Fiedler as if inspired. Faultless in execution its work was filled with that temperamental enthusiasm that distinguishes the accomplishments of the artist from the efforts of the mere performer.

The beautiful overture to Weber's opera, "Oberon," served as an excellent appetizer for what was to follow. It was rendered with a mastery that brought out all its beauties.

The great feature of the evening was Beethoven's symphony in A major, No. 7, which was interpreted with a spirit and an understanding that carried rare pleasure to the ears while its melodies charmed the soul.

Two striking novelties on the program were Debussy's ultra-modern prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss' sprightly, merry rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The rendition of this latter number was marked by a succession of unique musical effects. All departments of the orchestra were called into play in this and all responded with telling effect.

The prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" was beautifully done. Every note of it was filled with tonal charm, from the pianissimo opening of the violins through the swelling crescendo up to the splendid climax with the whole orchestra in one grand burst of harmony. The concert ended with the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," which was done with the sonorous strength that makes the music of Wagner so impressive.

Max Fiedler displayed masterly ability as a conductor, having all departments of the orchestra under his close control at all times and seeming to sway the musicians with his own musical emotions. The audience gave both conductor and orchestra a striking ovation at the close of the concert.

Arthur W. Stace.

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date APR 6 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAS ENTHUSIASTIC AUDIENCE

The "Unfinished" by Schubert, With Its Appealing Melodies, Is Greatly Enjoyed

By PAUL K. HARPER.

The last of the series of concerts by visiting symphony orchestras arranged by the Pittsburg Orchestral Association took place last evening in Soldiers' Memorial Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, was presented. The program was one of the most interesting and thoroughly enjoyable of the season and the audience one of the largest and most enthusiastic. The "Overture to Egmont," by Beethoven, was used to open the program. The powerful reading given the mighty work aroused enthusiasm and gave the keenest pleasure. The symphony was the "B Minor," by Franz Schubert, more familiarly known as the "Unfinished," and was given an admirable rendition, eminently satisfactory in every respect. The mellow 'cello passages were most agreeably given.

"Death and Transfiguration," the majestic tone poem by Richard Strauss, is "program" music of the most emphatic description, and is almost morbidly typical of the none too pleasant subject. The wonderful artistry of the man cannot be denied, but the almost brutal directness of the allegro molto agitato is to an extent depressing. The authoritative reading of the work went far to make it impressive and appreciated. The "Prelude" to Richard Wagner's "Lohengrin" was given with fine effect, especially the opening portion by the violins. The "Overture to Tannhauser" is always sure of a warm welcome, and last evening was no exception to the rule.

The soloist was Alwin Schroeder, the principal 'cellist of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder played "Variations on a Rococo Theme," by Tschaikowsky. The technical difficulties which the soloist surmounted were a wonder to many who were not familiar with the possibilities of this wonderful instrument, which takes on new beauties in the hands of so finished an artist as Mr. Schroeder undoubtedly is.

About Concerts

MR. Fiedler has ordered as follows the programme of the final pair of Symphony Concerts on May 3 and 4, at which he will end his term as the conductor of the orchestra:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms
Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan"—Siegfried's Apotheosis from "Götterdämmerung"—Prelude to "Lohengrin"—Overture to "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

Mr. Shepherd's new piece, "Marsyas," has been dropped from the programme of the Symphony Concerts for this week. In its stead Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the second movement of Beethoven's "Eriocа" symphony will be played—the latter to the memory of those lost on the Titanic. It will begin what promises to be an exceptionally long concert.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 24, 1912

"THE POPS" HERE AGAIN FOR LONG STAY.

Conductor Strube and His Players Give Pleasing Program And Receive Overwhelming Applause.

THE OPENING NIGHT OF "THE POPS" AS SEEN BY THE GLOBE ARTIST.

"The Pops" arrived last night for a prolonged stay at Symphony Hall.

"The Pops" are an institution invented primarily for the benefit of those delicately organized persons whose digestions will not permit them to listen to symphonic music unless they dilute it with a pretzel, a lemonade or perchance a bottle of "Goetterdaemmerung" with a cherry on top.

To those who cannot take music straight without experiencing dire postprandial distress, "the pops" are urgently recommended by the best physicians and caterers.

The first night of the Pops is an occasion of great musical and social significance. The Symphony Orchestra has been busy rehearsing and giving concerts throughout the Winter for this event, when 55 picked men are allowed to play as a reward of merit.

Heretofore Mr Strube has recognized the occasion by composing a march to be unveiled at this time for the first time anywhere. Last night he turned his muse to sighs rather than to bugle blasts, and later in the evening brought forward a number modestly called "Serenade," but enthusiastically redemanded.

It being unfortunately too late for critical opinion upon Mr Strube's piece, it may be said that the only defect with it was that people listened too intently to be able to eat and drink at the same time.

Whereas the weather lessened the brilliance of the evening with regard to the display in gowns and millinery, customarily a principal adjunct of the entertainment, distinguished femininity was not absent from the program.

"The Queen of Sheba," according to Gounod, headed an august procession, to be followed by the "Merry Wives of Windsor," they in turn making way for the "Girls of Baden." The famous air of Delilah was heard in the second group together with other music associated with her services in the cause of Dagon, and finally the "Pink Lady" was remembered by a selection.

The program did not state that the prelude to Act 3 of Wolf-Ferrari's "The Jewels of the Madonna" was heard for the first time in Boston. This is an opera now familiar in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, Minneapolis and perhaps in other Western cities.

It discloses no striking or novel devices in invention, harmonic or orchestral treatment. Waltz rhythm is ingratiatingly prominent and there are definite and suave melodic lines. The effect of this excerpt out of its operatic sequence and context is necessarily limited, but for its own sake, this music was altogether pleasing.

As a warning let it be added that the member of the battery department who places in view the placards bearing the program numbers of the pieces to be played, was diligently coached by the audience in his share of the performance. After the appearance of the benevolent legend "Extra," Mr Strube began Handel's "Largo" with Mr. Marshall at the organ and Mr Hoffman playing the solo. At the conclusion of the steadily mounting climax with the full strings and the magnificent organ, the audience burst into overwhelming applause.

Mr Strube took his place as though for an encore, when the "Extra" disappeared, leaving "9" in its place. The applause immediately burst forth and continued until the "extra" card, again removed, went back to stay, and the repeat of the number was played.

The program tonight will be as follows:

March from Damnation of Faust.....Berlioz
Overture, The Barber of Seville.....Rossini
Waltz, Die Fledermaus.....Strauss
Carnaval Venetien.....Burgmein
(a) Florinde, (b) Rosaura, (c) Columbine, (d) Arlequin
Selection, Carmen.....Bizet
Two movements from The Nut-Cracker Suite.....Tschaikowsky
(a) Danse de Mirlitons, (b) Danse Russe Trepak.
Prelude to Lohengrin.....Wagner
Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
March, Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Organ, Mr Marshall.
Meditation from Thais.....Massenet
Solo violin, Mr J. Hoffmann.
Selection, The Siren.....Fall
March, Mit Standarten.....Blon

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 6, 1912

The Final Rites for Mr. Fiedler

CONTRARY to expectation, the public of Saturday evening at the Symphony Concerts parted still more cordially with Mr. Fiedler than did the public of Friday afternoon. There are many more men in the audiences of Saturday, and thus applause gains in volume, accent, and staying power. The concert was, moreover, the end of the series for the year and of Mr. Fiedler's term as conductor. It had its little rites, like the bunch of roses that awaited him, when he came to his place; like the big wreaths of laurel, tied with the German colors, that were handed to him at the end of the concert, like the tall silver vase, austere of line and reticent in its inscription, that the orchestra gave to him in the intermission for memory of their four years of work together. The leave-taking of Friday seemed a mere preliminary beside these formalities, and the applause that the conductor received then was tame indeed beside the plaudits that followed him through the concert of Saturday. The impression has been that the audiences of the afternoon liked Mr. Fiedler more generally and warmly than did the audiences of the evenings. The incidents of Saturday belied the impression—or else were the exception that proved the rule. Anyhow, to the end the audience kept its wonted discrimination. For it more applauded Mr. Fiedler at the end of Brahms's symphony in C minor, wherein he had blended the tonal and the expressive virtues, insight, imagination and emotion to revealing and thrilling outcome, than it did at the end of his excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas.

Had the occasion been a political convention instead of a symphony concert, the attendant reporters would probably have timed the aplause that greeted Mr. Fiedler when he first appeared. It continued surprisingly long, so that it rose and fell, gathered itself again, mounted anew and held the conductor, as it seemed for four or five minutes with bent and acknowledging head. It was quick and hearty at the end of the overture to "Oberon" and at each pause in Brahms's symphony. When it was done, by a common accord, almost the whole audience rose to its feet, recalled the conductor once, twice and thrice, and volleyed its applause at him and the standing orchestra. The pieces from Wagner came and went to due measure of applause, and then, at the end of the concert, when the wreaths were borne up the aisle, everyone stood before and behind the conductor and stilled the plaudits only when he lifted his hand to speak. His little speech was much like that of Friday afternoon, though less clearly spoken because Mr. Fiedler was plainly much more moved. Such emotion may reasonably excuse a somewhat tactless allusion to the circumstances of his departure and the possibility of return. Mr. Fiedler has served his term with honor to himself, with satisfaction to his public, with due devotion to the standards of the orchestra and the concerts. It ends according to the conditions originally and clearly determined for it. There is no more to be said. The speech ended; the applause swelled once more; the stage and the auditorium quickly emptied. The leave-taking was done, and it had added speech-making by the departing conductor to the customs of the Symphony Concerts.

H. T. P.

[92]

NOTES AND COMMENT UPON MUSICAL MATTERS

Edited by OLIN DOWNES

MR. FIEDLER'S CONDUCTORSHIP

Popularity of the Man and His Direction—Effect in and Outside of Boston—His Impressions of Musical America—Commencement of Pop Concerts Tomorrow Night.

Last night Mr. Fiedler concluded brilliantly his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Before his arrival in Boston in the fall of 1908 he had made himself a very considerable reputation in Europe, which was materially augmented in American estimation when, as one of a series of eminent conductors, he visited New York in the winter of 1905 to conduct a pair of concerts of the Philharmonic Society.

Mr. Fiedler was first engaged for Boston for one year. He was re-engaged for the season of 1909-10. These two seasons were so successful that the management elected to engage him for two more seasons, or until the time when Dr. Muck, as had been agreed when he and Boston parted company, should find himself able to return here. Dr. Muck will return next fall, as he is now free of his European engagements.

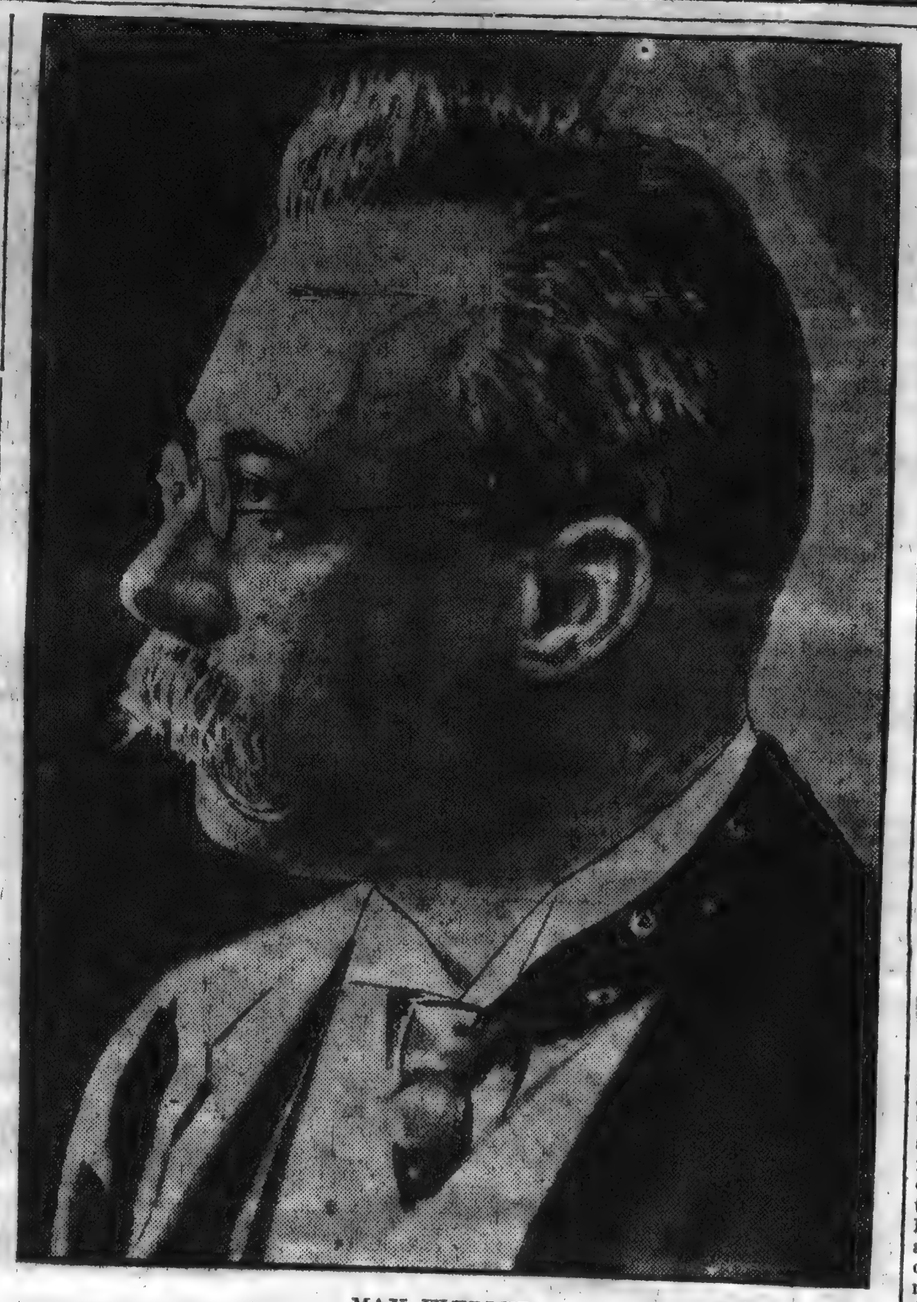
Mr. Fiedler's success in Boston and in other of the big cities visited each season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been richly deserved. Few conductors have labored more faithfully, with more breadth of view and communicating enthusiasm, for the good of their audiences. The public does not realize, and can hardly be expected to realize, the amount of sheer labor and mental strain involved by a season which embraces 24 pairs of concerts in Boston, six concerts in Cambridge, and out-of-town concerts to a number that results in a total of approximately 100 concerts a season.

It is one thing to travel the country as a virtuoso conductor, giving concerts of compositions which are especially dear to the individual heart, and a very different thing to arrange programmes and to perform them in a manner to give pleasure and satisfaction to what is unquestionably one of the most critical audiences in the world. Not for years have these programmes been so well balanced and contrasted and so fairly representative of music of all schools and all periods as during Mr. Fiedler's sway. No conductor at the head of this orchestra has been so curious to discover for himself and his hearers all that was of real interest and worth in the field of orchestral literature.

It has been of little consequence to Mr. Fiedler whether a composer lived in 1750 or 1912, in Boston or Stuttgart or Helsingfors, provided that the music was of genuine merit. When Mr. Fiedler came here he was known as a man of unusually eclectic tastes and as an especially brilliant interpreter of moderns such as Richard Strauss. He has proved much more than this. Having at command a superb orchestra and a library that made nearly all things possible for performance, he set himself to discovering and appreciating the works of modern Frenchmen and Englishmen, some of whom had not been given a hearing in Boston. He gave much additional stimulus to the growing fame of the great Northman, Jean Sibelius.

Yet more: he summoned the courage to put before his public the compositions of native or resident composers; not only those already known, but those nearly or wholly new to concert halls, no reputation or prestige in any quired, to foist them upon audiences. In this direction also Mr. Fiedler has been brilliantly successful. Counting year for year, neither Mr. Gerlake nor Dr. Muck produced so many new compositions which now appear to be of considerable value. Before coming to Boston, Mr. Fiedler had read and in some cases performed the music of the modern French school, which, however, was with him a matter of hearsay and score reading, rather than of actual experience in performance. In the course of his stay here, beginning from a point not too near the style of these men, Mr. Fiedler has achieved some memorable performances of such distinctive music as Debussy's "Iberia," the "Nocturnes," the "Afternoon of a Faun," of D'Indy's B-flat symphony and "Istar" variations. The second performances of most of these works were a remarkable revelation of the conductor's gradually growing insight into their mood and manner. Hardly had any phase of Mr Fiedler's work here in Boston been so praiseworthy as this. To all compositions that he undertook to interpret he has brought fresh attention and propulsive enthusiasm, at the end as well as the beginning of each season; and with every season that passed, the growth of the conductor as well as the interest of his performances was matter for congratulation. It may be said here, and without undue local pride, that years at the head of the Boston Symphony have not failed to develop each conductor who has been here. Such a thing is logical, and, in fact, inevitable, especially with a musician of the breadth of outlook and the self-critical habits of Mr. Fiedler. He will leave Boston not only great in the esteem of his audiences, but a greater musician, and one whose reputation has been materially enhanced since he came here. The particular brilliancy of certain performances need not be recounted at this time. It is enough for present purposes to remark that the public regard for Mr. Fiedler has been great and unmistakable from the moment he first appeared, that it has grown with each season. Especially in a much-needed direction—the out-of-town concerts—the material results of his leadership have been especially notable. The out-of-town concerts have gained far more patronage during his stay than in corresponding periods before him, and the enthusiasm of the public and the press of the cities visited has continually increased, until at this time the Symphony Orchestra has extended its tours to the point where it is physically impossible to extend them farther.

The work has reflected the man. Mr. Fiedler has spent little time in relaxation or in attendance at social functions or at any other distractions. He was to be found, nearly always, in the rehearsal hall or with his scores. Hard work, occasional visits to smaller concerts given by his own men, whom he supported personally as well as professionally, took up most of his leisure. Many will miss the sight of him, absorbed in his music, on the rostrum in Symphony Hall. They will not find in greater degree the communicating enthusiasm, the warmth and sincerity of feeling that so often carried all before them in performance, and they will cherish the memory of the unassuming sincerity and geniality of the man, his quick response to all who approached him in a spirit of personal friendship or artistic endeavor. When Mr. Fiedler sails this week for Germany he will carry with him the warmest regards of the large and enthusiastic following which he has gained for himself in this city.



MAX FIEDLER.

Mr. Fiedler has been surprised and amused by the differences of opinion which he has noticed between certain American cities, more particularly between Boston and New York. "Is there possibly," he said, "a difference between the rivalry between the two cities? I don't just understand just how it is, but what Boston likes New York does not care for, and what New York likes—they are cold in Boston. I would like to know the reason for this. The difference between the personal attitude of various reviewers can easily be understood. One man does not consider Brahms a master. Another exalts Grieg. Another thinks that no modern composers write anything that is worth while. Another favors the French school, etc. That is all right. All these men are intelligent and sincere, and they have a right to their opinions and their feelings. But it has astonished me more than once to observe the general unanimity of praise and dispraise on the part of the factions of each city. It is as though they set themselves to personally contradict each other."

We were unable to explain this "why" to Mr. Fiedler.

When Mr. Fiedler came to Boston four years ago he was practically new to the American audience and to the attitude in matters of art in this country. After four years' experience he can speak of the musical state of affairs here. It is much easier to introduce a new work in America than in a European country, because, in Europe, unless the new work be entirely in accord with the tendencies of the district, it is sure to be received with distrust, and likely to meet with rather unreflecting condemnation. And each European nation has its peculiar tastes and standards, not easily relaxed or modified for the benefit of a new composer or a new school. The Americans are embarrassed by no tradition, and always eager to learn.

Mr. Fiedler thought musical criticism in this country to be on fully as high a level, when the best representatives of Europe and America were considered, as abroad, and he has been perpetually amazed by the rapidity and the journalistic skill with which the reviewers sum up their impressions of a composition or a performance. "But it is too bad that they must write in such haste. I do not see how anyone, however intelligent, can give either a very authoritative opinion, or even express fully his own opinion, in the hour or hour and a half which I understand is the average length of time afforded for the reporting of an evening performance in a morning newspaper."

There are others who do not understand this besides Mr. Fiedler. There are others to whom the expression of a critical opinion in the red pepper hour at the office seems often to be a vain thing.

Mr. Fiedler spoke of "objective" and "subjective" interpretation. "I do not see," he said in effect, "why a conductor should be censured as many are (and this is not personal)—for interpreting some classic work in his own way. As if he could possibly do otherwise and make the music alive or appealing to anyone. Of course, there are certain restrictions which the reader of a masterpiece of the classic period must observe. Principal among them, it seems to me, is the necessity of conservatism as regards tempi.

"The conductor must not beat time like a stick, but he must not be too free with rhythmic fluctuations that cannot fail to disturb the proportions of the composition. And the classic masters spoke more simply than most of the moderns. But if you realize these things, what then? There is a great deal more, and I do not believe that Beethoven conducted his symphonies every time like the last time. I think he felt them differently when he was in different moods and I think he played them accordingly. I cannot see how any music can live when it is performed, if it is not given out in a 'subjective' manner. I think some of the trouble arises from tradition. There were conductors who misinterpreted Beethoven. Then, at the time of Wagner there arose a later school, who adhered solemnly to metronomic directions and to every quarter note in the score. From this time dated the caution against overdoing Beethoven. But if you feel Beethoven at all, you cannot help feeling him in your own way, and if a pianist can give a new reading of a Beethoven sonata, I do not see why a conductor cannot do the same thing."

The novelties of the season past were fewer than those of Mr. Fiedler's earlier seasons. Among the few of interest and value as additions to the repertoire of the orchestra is Balakireff's overture on a theme of Spanish March, a brutal, vulgar, savage piece of work, which displeased a majority by its coarseness, and which gave pleasure to a few by its directness, virility and dramatic fire. Mr. Granville Bantock's "Dante and Beatrice" was not a pronounced success. The tone-pieces by William Wallace and by Frederick Delius, on the other hand, interested the public and nearly all of the reviewers greatly. Reger's "Comedy Overture" was admired by some, rejected by others. Sibelius' "Karelia" overture is an early work of the composer, not fit to stand beside his great achievements of a later day.

Mr. Converse's symphonic poem, "Ormazd," has some excellent pages, although, in the opinion of the reviewer, it does not reach the height attained by the composer in "The Mystic Trumpeter." Elgar's second symphony was voted to be, if anything, duller than his first. The "Jena" symphony in C-major, purporting to be an early work of Beethoven, will not be played here again, whosever work it is. Four character pieces, orchestrated from piano sketches by Arthur Foote, after Omar Khayyam, received very successful performances. A tone-poem by Arthur Sheperd, "Marsyas," was not performed on account of the fact that the composer, hearing it rehearsed, bravely requested Mr. Fiedler to withdraw the work from the programme. Apart fom these novelties, however, the programme was fully as interesting and varied as in any recent seasons of the orchestra. Beethoven was represented by four symphonies, four overtures, the Emperor piano concerto (played by Wilhelm Bachaus), a familiar scena sung by Berta Morena, and, possibly, by the "Jena" symphony. Three of the Brahms symphonies, the first, second and fourth, the Academic overture and the festival violin concerto were played. There was a notable performance of Bruckner's seventh symphony. Debussy "Nocturnes," "Iberia" and Prelude to Mallarme's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faun" were played, and played excellently. Enesco's singular orchestral suite, op. 9, in A-major, was played for the second time here, and it again made a genuine impression. Looming large on the list is D'Indy's magnificent work, the "Istar" variations. Two of Liszt's symphony poems, the "Dante" symphony, the A-major piano concerto (played by Heinrich Gebhard) were played. There was the fine second symphony of Rachmaninoff, the colorful suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Scheherazade"; Sibelius' violin concerto (an epic that was splendidly interpreted by Miss Powell). There was a fine group of Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Death and Transfiguration," "Symphony Domestica," "Till Eulenspiegel," the love scene from "Feursnot" and the dance of Salome from the opera. There were the customary overtures, preludes and excerpts of Wagner, the customary classics of Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Franck's great symphony, other compositions by Berlioz, Bossi, Boellmann, Bruch, Cherubini, Chopin, Dvorak, Forsyth, Glazounoff, Gluck, Goetz, Grieg, Lalo, Smetana, Strube, Tschaikowsky, Weber, Weingartner, Wolf. On the whole, a notable season with some excellent soloists, including the following:

Sopranos—Miss Elena Gerhardt, Mme. Alma Gluck, Mme. Morena.
Contralto—Mme. Schumann-Heink.
Pianists—Mr. Bachaus, Mr. Bauer, Mr. Ganz, Mr. Gebhard, Miss Goodson, Mr. Hofmann.
Violinists—Miss Collier, Mr. Noack, Miss Parlow, Miss Powell, Mr. Witek, Mr. Zimbalist.
Viola—Mr. Ferir.
Violoncellists—Mr. Schroeder, Mr. Warnke.

The idea came to the management to make them popular in fact as well as in name; to remove the formal rows of seats and replace them with tables and chairs, and serve such light refreshments as patrons listening to an evening of light music might want, and generally replace the stiff formality of the winter season with an atmosphere of more genuine Bohemianism. With the exception of a few years when there were no concerts, every spring since 1885 has seen a season of these concerts, first in old Music Hall and then, since 1901, in Symphony Hall. There has been surprisingly little change in their character, and while each year has seen the management looking to the physical comfort of the patrons, the Pops, in essence, remain unchanged, and have become the most characteristic feature of the spring season in Boston. As a matter of fact, the Pops are unique in the character and quality of the entertainment offered. The orchestra is composed of 55 selected members of Boston's greatest artistic asset—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The conductors are musicians skilled in the making of popular programmes and thoroughly in touch with all new music of popular character that is being published. The latest novelties are played, as well as the old and tried favorites. Now and then a touch of seriousness is given by a Wagner programme or a Tschaikowsky programme, but never is the enticing Vienna waltz or the prize tune from the latest musical comedy neglected to make room for what some call "classics."

The Pops this season cover a period of eight weeks, from tomorrow evening, May 6, to Saturday evening, June 29. The concerts will be given, as usual, every evening of the week except Sundays from 8 to 11. During the first four weeks the conductor is Mr. Gustav Strube. The conductor of the last half of the season will be Mr. Andre Maquarre. This is Mr. Maquarre's fourth season as a Pop conductor, and he is one of the best liked the concerts have had. In the first half of the season the concert master will be Mr. Jacques Hoffmann; in the second half, Mr. William Kfarrt. Mr. John P. Marshall is again the organist. The programme for the opening night is as follows:

MONDAY, MAY 6.

March, "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"..Nicolai
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komgak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite.....
"Sylvia".....Delibes
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Serenade .....Strube
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
Introduction to Act III, from "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf Ferrari
Overture, "Il Guarany".....Gomes
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Selection, "The Pink Lady".....Caryll
March, "Hans Richter".....Schrammel

BOSTON SUNDAY POST
MAY 5, 1912

Mr. Fiedler's Four Years With the Symphony

By H. T. P.

THROUGH the four years in which Mr. Fiedler has led the Symphony Orchestra, he has been a singularly uneven conductor. In Strauss's tone-poems, in certain highly colored and impassioned romantic music, like that of Liszt or Berlioz, of Rimsky-Korsakoff or Tschaikowsky, he has seemed a conductor of keen understanding, large imagination and high eloquence. In certain music of widely different sorts, he has achieved, again, curious tours de force—as in Debussy's Nocturnes a week ago, as in Brahms's symphony in C-minor only yesterday, in Franck's symphony, in d'Indy's, in the symphonies of Schumann, in the choral symphony of Beethoven. With these and with many another piece, he has wrought unexpectedly sympathetic and revealing performances. On the other hand, he has been less discerning and eloquent with romantic music, like Wagner's or Weber's that requires in the conductor an instinctive and practised sense of the theatre in order to make its full effect. He has fallen short sometimes in music that asked subtlety of imagination and finesse of execution. Often he has striven overmuch to make his classic symphonies expressive in the contemporary sense of the word, restlessly and tirelessly manipulating them out of their more reticent and ordered selves.

Time and again, Mr. Fiedler has seemed to over-drive his orchestra, seeking mass and stress of tone from it rather than balance, euphony, and adroitly woven and colored texture. Then the orchestra has sounded over-emphatic. Time and again, no less, he has practised the virtues of sensitiveness and finesse and attained a beautiful and expressive quality of tone, various and elastic accent, significant and sensuous instrumental coloring. Under his hand, music could seem like orchestral song, free and supple, yet sustained and ordered. It could also seem like a succession of disjointed and contrasting phrases, or like song so long drawn and sentimentalized that it was near breaking under its own heaviness. Neither Dr. Muck nor Mr. Gericke before him so ran the gamut of a conductor's virtues and a conductor's shortcomings.

On the other hand, in two respects Mr. Fiedler has been the most even of conductors. None of his predecessors has been more diligent and conscientious, or has given himself more whole-heartedly and devotedly to his work. None of his successors is likely, in human nature and human industry, to be more so. Furthermore, Mr. Fiedler has sustained remarkably the variety, the catholicity and the interest of his programmes. They have pleased the expert no less than the average hearer. By these qualities, with all his unevenness, Mr. Fiedler has worn well, and the conductor of fifty concerts in seven months of each year in Boston and of fifty or sixty of seventy in other cities, besides, must wear well in more senses than one. If the range and the qualities of his conducting could be charted, as economists chart the fluctuations of prices or of immigration, the line would indeed be irregular; but it would have many high points and the average level of it would not be low. Very seldom indeed—and through 200 concerts in Boston—has Mr. Fiedler's conducting or his programme been uninteresting.

Mr. Fiedler's Own Progress

Like almost all the conductors that have led the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler quits it an abler conductor than he came to it. Even after four years, it is easy to recall the extravagances of gesture and of conductorial manner that were distracting to watch and superfluous, seemingly, in result in his first concerts here. Soon he discovered that they were not to the liking of his audiences or necessary to his purposes with the band, and he gradually put them aside. To the end Mr. Fiedler has conducted with a certain "manner"—the fashion in which he straightens his figure and throws back his shoulders at moments of sustained orchestral climax, in the pointed summoning of particular instruments or groups of instruments, in nervous quickening of rhythm, in the moulding of phrases upon the air. But in this "manner," there has not been a trace of pose or affectation. It was the outward and visible sign of his devoted surrender to the task in hand, of his whole-hearted exertion of a conductor's power. Mr. Fiedler has never done too little. Rather his tendency has been to do too much.

Mr. Fiedler received from the past of the orchestra the standards that make the Symphony Concerts catholic of programme and hospitable to new, singular or neglected music. He has amply and loyally maintained them. In his work in Germany he had little experience of the newer French music—of Debussy, d'Indy and the rest. Here in Boston he has studied it, put it in due proportion on his programme and achieved notable performances of it. In Symphony Hall, too, he has conducted in much more novel music than would have stood on his lists had he been conducting for four years past in Germany. Mr. Fiedler has been very alert and catholic in his choice of such pieces; he has studied them thoroughly and he has broadened under the process. The following of no composer can complain that he has neglected their "master," except the following of Mahler, and "Mahlerites" are fewer in this town than even the "Regerites." Similarly, Mr. Fiedler quickly discovered that the executive standard of the orchestra and the expectations of its public on that score were high. Never before had he had a band of such general and individual quality to do his bidding. He will be fortunate if he ever has another like it. At first he seemed a little inclined to underestimate its quality, to be trying to wrench it away to ruder standards of his own. Then he better appreciated its distinctive virtues and the public regard for them. Within the limits of his temperament and the handicap of his unevenness, he has tried to maintain them. He will hand to his successor an orchestra that needs a new refining and a closer preoccupation with the more subtle qualities of tone and expression, an orchestra that needs a less goading and a more sensitive hand, but also one that still maintains its two-fold standard—of a rare virtuosity in its high and full sense and of a rare expressive range and power on the poetic and emotional, the dramatizing and characterizing side of music.

The Public, the Conductor and His Men

From the beginning to the end Mr. Fiedler has kept the liking of his public here, especially of the audiences of Friday afternoon. In New York and in the other major cities that the orchestra regularly visits, he has held and increased its audiences and they have approved him more in the second half of his term than in the first. In the minor cities, particularly in New England, where the orchestra undertakes occasional concerts, Mr. Fiedler has been the best-liked of its recent conductors. He has not used these concerts for experiments and he has not taken them as so much routine. He has seemed no less interested in them than in the concerts in Boston or in New York. As the newspapers of these cities like to say, "he has given them of his best." In particular he has arranged programmes that interested them—that gave them a full two hours of music, that did not reject familiar, even hackneyed pieces, that were not ordered according to a theory that would fit them into a series of fifty concerts rather than an occasional visit. Of all the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra he has been the best-liked "on the road."

Throughout the four years under Mr. Fiedler, the men of the orchestra have had their repinings over him as they have over every conductor set above them. They have been known to complain that he was over-fussy at rehearsals; that he would take nothing for granted; that he was strenuous to weariness; and that he gave the virtuosi of the orchestra too little play for their individuality. No conductor, while he is in command of an orchestra, is a hero to its members. They see the qualities in him that irk them through the magnifying end of the glass. After he is gone they reverse the instrument. The good repute of conductors with their men is almost always posthumous. A year hence Mr. Fiedler may not fall of it. At least, none of his predecessors has been so quick to share applause with the band, has so often called it to its feet.

In Boston and out of it, a considerable part of Mr. Fiedler's admiring public has liked him most because he seemed so eager to conduct and gave himself so completely to his work. No conductor could be more industrious and conscientious than he. Under him the number of concerts that the orchestra can wisely undertake through a season has probably reached its maximum and he has rebelled at no journeyings. At home and abroad, he has lengthened the concerts—a desirable change in Boston in particular, if the conductor is to have range and freedom in the ordering of his programmes. He has been tireless at rehearsal, in the private study of familiar and unfamiliar music, in the scrutiny of new pieces, in the hearing of players who would join the orchestra or who would appear at its concerts. It is the wise policy of the Symphony Orchestra to make the conductor the unquestioned and responsible master of it on its artistic side. Whatever he asks, he receives. Whatever decision he makes, that decision is accepted. A conductor could hardly have been more loyal and sedulous than Mr. Fiedler in the discharge of these responsibilities. When he has seemed to err, he has erred in good faith and, sometimes, as in the choice of soloists, out of good feeling.

The Sum of the Work

Out of this diligence and loyalty, this whole-hearted devotion to his work, this earnest energy in all things, have sprung the salient qualities in Mr. Fiedler's conducting that have won and held the liking of his public. It has liked his passionate eagerness that all music should "sound" to the utmost in its kind. Mr. Fiedler has not spared in the sweep and the sonority of his climaxes, though on occasion he might force the tone of his orchestra and the substance and emotion of the music. He has courted the emphatic contrast, the telling transition, the biting accent, the significant pause. A swift pace indicated in the music has often tempted him to more swiftness until the orchestra could barely keep in the race with him. A slow pace has similarly beguiled him to yet more slowness. He likes, at one extreme, the big, thick, broad and swelling tonal mass; at the other the flashing instrumental detail. He would always be eloquent, always intense. When music merely ran forward, as it does so often in the classics and in transitional passages in the moderns, it seemed to irk him. His eagerness with it drove him to ceaseless modifications of pace and rhythm, to the tireless moulding of phrases. He could not let it alone. Not to try to make it more expressive was alien to his temperament, alien to his sense of duty.

In a word, Mr. Fiedler has been a conductor, through these four years, of large power, of high intensities, of manfully sustained energies. The average auditor could not mistake his eloquence or miss his excitements, and he or she has admired Mr. Fiedler accordingly. On the other hand, a considerable band of real or affected connoisseurs have grown weary of this incessant vigor, bigness and emphasis, and have pined for refinements, subtleties, differentiations, for traits of insight and imagination that were not in Mr. Fiedler to give. This band has judged the conductor over-harshly and a little contemptuously after the manner of its superior kind. On the other hand, the legion of Mr. Fiedler's admirers, resenting this attitude, has gone too far in its praise of his insistent emphasis and his big eloquence.

Between the two has hovered a third body of listeners who have tried to hear and judge Mr. Fiedler understandingly and justly. They have disagreed with his excesses of pace and regretted them. They have been impatient of his restless modulations, mouldings and emphases. They have believed that a certain coarseness of tone was gaining upon the orchestra and clouding its fine power. All conductors have their limitations. Certain pieces that Mr. Fiedler has attempted have lain outside his insight, imagination and interpretative qualities. He has neither revealed nor characterized them. Yet this same body of comprehending, sympathetic and just-minded listeners has been the quickest and the warmest to praise him, when he has achieved his tours de force, when he has seemed to open and to vitalize his music, when he has sustained it in a magnificent and diversified eloquence, when to excitement he has added emotion and to sweeping power a penetrating beauty. For Mr. Fiedler at his best has done these things and frequently in these long four years of 200 concerts. Occasionally in them he has done his lamentable worst; while between the heights and the depths, he has maintained the insistent intensity that have held his hearers in interest and expectation. There has been no token of weariness with Mr. Fiedler as there was with Mr. Gericke in his final years. He has been too energetic and uneven to become a habit with his audiences. Above all his predecessors he has been the intensive conductor of the orchestra.

The Standard of Repertory

Each conductor when he comes to the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Concerts receives them with certain standards. It is incumbent upon him to maintain and to enhance these standards—if he can—and to transmit them unimpaired to his successor. Therein is the final test of his conductorship, and Mr. Fiedler bears it well. He has bettered these standards by his lengthening of the concerts so that apart from intermission and applausive intervals, there should be an hour and a half at least of music. The tendency had been to shorten the concerts until there was too little room on the programme for music new and old and for variety of music. And an hour and three-quarters has not proved too long a time to hold even a restless and short-breathed American audience in the concert-room. Again, he has restored the short miscellaneous piece to its just place in the repertory of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke cultivated such pieces; Dr. Muck neglected them; Mr. Fiedler has cultivated them anew with increased pleasure to his hearers and with no abatement of the standards of the concerts. He has kept the programmes to their established and proportioned catholicity, neither overlooking nor subordinating music that should justly stand upon them.

The classics and the semi-classics, modern and ultra-modern pieces, the music of all schools from the newest Frenchmen of Paris and the new generation of English composers to the strong sons of the North and the rising, or risen men of America, have had their due place in the concerts. Mr. Fiedler, as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra is bound to do, has kept his audiences informed about the music written in our immediate hour. He has not neglected the elder music to which some listen with safe and comfortable appreciation, which others hear that they may have juster view and keener appreciation of the new. All this range of pieces Mr. Fiedler has coördinated into programmes that have assumed the diversity of taste and interest in his hearers and the need of contrast even in a single concert. Some of his programmes have been a very adroit adjustment of these several tastes; as many more have been ingenious progressions to a stirring end. Thereby Mr. Fiedler has kept the concerts steadily pleasing, steadily interesting to their average and to their more exacting public. On the score of repertory and programmes, he has held to the high standards of the orchestra and bettered them.

The Standard of Conducting

It would be futile and common to try to rank Mr. Fiedler among the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra. Such ranking signifies nothing but our innate American mania for superlatives. Few, moreover, can remember the conductors of the earlier years vividly enough to make such judgments just, while every one in the making of them is swayed by personal idiosyncrasy. At his frequent best in the traits already cited, Mr. Fiedler has been worthy of the severest standards of the orchestra and its public—here and elsewhere—if he has not raised them. In the average of his work, his dominant intensity has made it, to many temperaments, wear well. His very uneavenness has given it a stimulating variety. Other conductors than he—especially when they must give fifty concerts in seven months before the same public—have had their worsts too. He is high in the second if not quite in the first flight of the conductors of our time. The very energy of his temperament, the devotion of his energetic spirit, have denied him certain faculties of imagination, characterization and discrimination.

The Standard of Performance

Mr. Gericke left the orchestra to Dr. Muck a perfectly trained and responsive instrument—a virtuoso orchestra. Dr. Muck maintained this virtuosity and made it the puissant and sensitive means to a new fire and force, a new expressive quality that gave its playing emotion. Under his hand, it poetized, dramatized, characterized, spoke with the peculiar voice of each piece, imparted the more intangible qualities of music. Mr. Fiedler received the two-fold standard, and he has striven sedulously to maintain it. In the inevitable course of the years and human nature there are one or two choirs in the orchestra that require reorganization; that are likely this very summer to undergo it. In the inevitable course of the years and of human nature, there are players in the orchestra who should now give way to others. Some of them have already done so. Yet, after such performances as that of Debussy's "Iberia" and his Nocturnes, of Strauss's tone-poems, of Brahms's and Schumann's and Wagner's music—to cite only a few instances from the current season—it is not just to say that the virtuosity of the orchestra has declined under Mr. Fiedler. He may not always have exercised it as adroitly as have some other conductors; but it has remained at his call.

So, too, with the rare mingling of sensuous and expressive quality in the playing of the orchestra as Mr. Fiedler received it. At the end of his four years it is capable of the old tonal beauty. It has often and within easy recollection achieved it, though sometimes the conductor may not have seemed sensitive to all the refinements and subtleties of it. Steadily, too, Mr. Fiedler has sustained and strengthened the expressive power of the orchestra. It keeps its old variety, elasticity, significance. If he has failed at all in this particular, he has failed by excess of zeal for it. Mr. Fiedler leaves the orchestra an instrument that he has used in his own way. Under his own idiosyncrasies, it is still an unimpaired instrument—ready to receive those of his successors.

POST,

MAY 1, 1912

SCHROEDER TO QUIT SYMPHONY

Veteran Cellist Plans to Retire

Among those who will retire from the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the final concerts of the season Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist of the orchestra, who has been a member since 1891. Mr. Schroeder was born in Germany, June 15, 1855. He studied music in Berlin and he has pursued a long and honorable career as an orchestra player and as a soloist of the first rank. He led the life of a virtuoso and a teacher in Europe until he came to Boston. He became the 'cellist of the Kneisel Quartet when that quartet was organized. The fame of the Kneisel Quartet grew steadily and its patronage increased until, in the spring of 1903, Mr. Schroeder resigned with Mr. Kneisel from the Symphony Orchestra in order to give his time exclusively to quartet playing.

In the spring of 1907 Mr. Schroeder resigned from the Kneisel Quartet to return to Europe and resume his career. Mr. Schroeder, like many another musician, found that Europe on his return there was not the land that he remembered it to be. He came back to America the following year and in 1910 reentered the Symphony Orchestra. For the past two seasons he has sat at the first 'cello desk with Mr. Warnke, and has made appearances as a soloist. He has also taken part in various concerts. He will henceforth devote his time to playing and occasional public appearances.

[194]

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, MAY 5, 1912

Alwin Schroeder, Famous 'Cellist, to Form "Schroeder Ensemble" With His Two Daughters

"My 20 years as a member of the Symphony Orchestra have been one long happiness, and in those 20 years I have seen Boston grow artistically to be the first city in America.

"Now I'm going to rest—that is, I'm going to teach, play as a soloist, and, more than that, I am going to form a 'Schroeder Ensemble' with my two daughters, Elfriede and Hedwig; sort of a family affair, nicht wahr?"—Alwin Schroeder, who has just retired from Boston's Symphony Orchestra.

One of Boston's foremost artists, who has taken a high rank as a cello player throughout the world, Alwin Schroeder will no longer sit, as for 20 long years, at the first cellist's desk in the beautiful hall where the Symphony Orchestra plays.

Thousands who have watched the wonderful player, and to whom his very person has become familiar, will miss him and they'll be looking for him, but in vain.

Instead, he intends to be a third of one of the most interesting trios of famous artists to be found in America. With his two gifted daughters he intends to perfect what will be called the "Schroeder Ensemble." And it is thought by musicians that an organization as wonderful in its ways at the Kneisel Quartet will be the inevitable result.

Miss Hedwig Schroeder is a pianist of the first rank, whose remarkable technique and sympathetic manner have won her plaudits and the praise of even the most exacting critics.

And Miss Elfriede, who is in private life Mrs. Walworth Kileski Bradbury, is an opera singer of note. To be sure, her one appearance at the Boston Opera House was her first and last, for she married immediately after it and retired permanently from the opera stage. But those who saw her in 1909 as Nedda in the opera Pag "I Ilacci" will remember her as a true artist.

That this new combination of father, daughter and younger daughter will be productive of the most gratifying results is certain, for each of the three is a virtuoso. And of Alwin Schroeder, the father, much can be told that is remarkable.

Father Self Taught

In the first place, he is absolutely self-taught. He never studied with a great teacher; never had the years and years of expert tuition that fall to the lot of most musicians. He learned by watching others.

A Sunday Post reported called on Mr. Schroeder at his charming home on Westbourne terrace, Brookline, where there is cooling air even on the sultriest day and a beautiful view of the surrounding country.

There they live—the members of this musical family. There is the studio where so much charming music has been made, and in it the great oil portrait of the master of the house stands as a sort of guardian spirit.

Evidences of the taste of the occupants are everywhere. A bust of some Roman youth, a bit of antique pottery, a statuette, curious antique draperies and rugs, a picture in oil or water color, a collection of good books, and the portrait by Miss Hazleton of Mr. Schroeder, seated with his beloved 'cello, at once hold the eye of the fortunate caller.

"Mr. Schroeder will be down presently," said Mrs. Schroeder, a fine, large woman with unmistakable German accent, and with a knack of putting callers at their ease in a moment.

"It's charming here, isn't it?" she continued. "And it's far removed from distracting noises. You know, formerly we were much troubled by automobiles and other disturbances, and my daughter found it so hard to do her studying in peace and quiet!

"Here it is lovely, and she can work away to her heart's content without a thought of interference. The studio, upstairs, is a rather busy place, I assure you, and it is—besides the pantry, of course—perhaps the most important room in the house; in any musician's house, as a matter of fact. But here he comes," and she retired as Mr. Schroeder came in.

Mr. Schroeder's Appearance

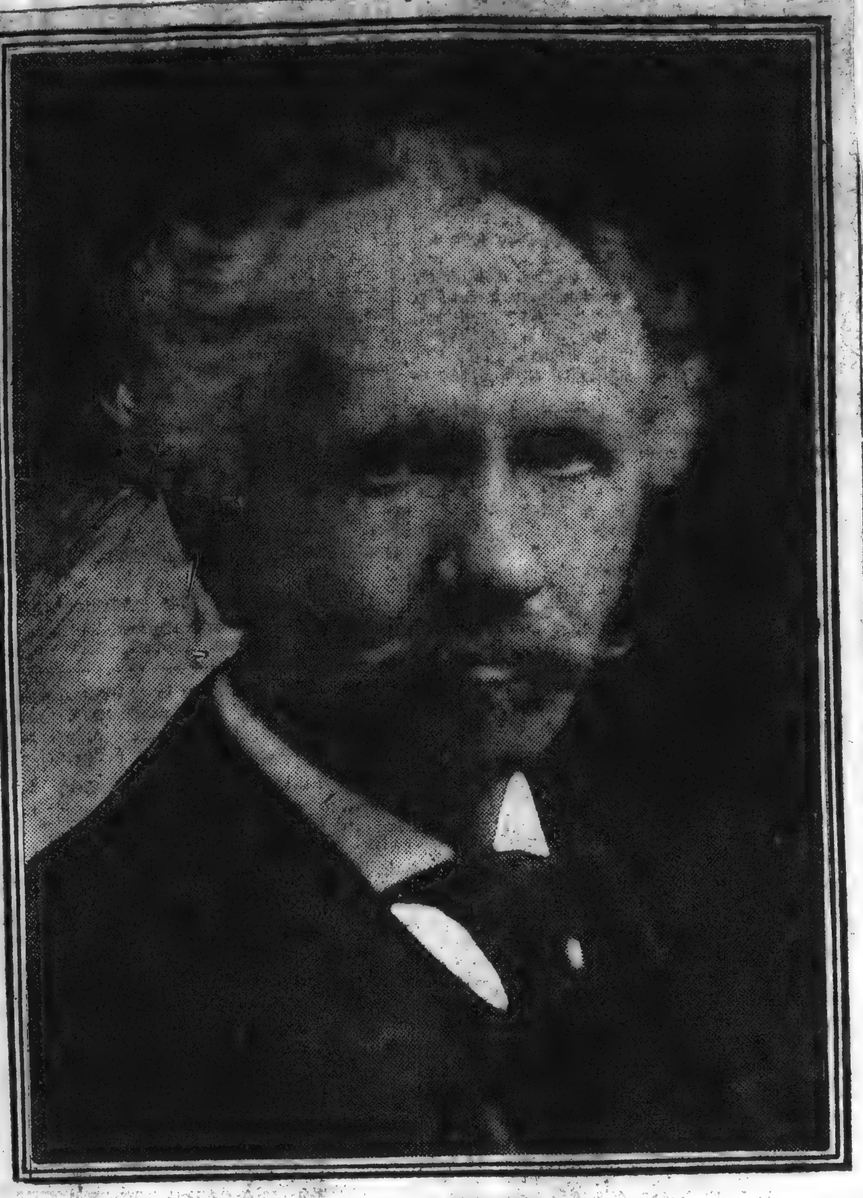
All who ever saw him at the concerts have seen him at home. He is just the same. Absolutely unaffected, of a rather small stature, with extremely quiet manners, with gray hair worn not too long, and most retiring in his ways Alwin Schroeder is a notable man.

Perhaps one of the most pleasant things about him is the fact that from his usual conversation one would never necessarily suspect the musician, since he can talk on any subject and seldom speaks of music unless it is with his confreres, or unless the topic comes up. He is not, as so many are, offensively the musician.

"Yes, it's true, I am going to retire from the Symphony, with which I have been for 20 long years," he said. There is only a slight trace of accent in his diction. Often times he looks much like another famous musician, Richard Strauss. He says that frequently their photographs are confused by even well-read musicians.

"But I'm not going back to Germany. Oh, no; I expect to live here in Boston for good. That sounds funny? Well, I'll tell you why it is that I do not wish to return to the country of my birth.

"I returned to Europe some years ago, after I had made Boston my home for 16 years. I had thought to live there again, to become once more a German. For, like all who have been born in other countries, there is in me a strong attachment for my mother country.



ALWIN SCHROEDER,
Who after 20 years as 'cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, has just retired.

Found Germany Different

"But I found when I got there that things were different. I had lived in Boston 16 years. I had played with a wonderful orchestra here. I had made many fine and firm friends. I had lived in an atmosphere far removed from the totally different one of Germany. I found when I got there that it would take me years to acclimate myself again. I found that I should have to begin all over again; in other words, I was an American trying to get used to living in Germany, just as on my first coming to Boston I had been a German trying to get used to America.

"Moreover, there was something about the climate that no longer agreed with me. I had trouble with my health, and especially with my arm, so necessary to me in my work with the violoncello. New ties drew me and I came back to America to make my home here for good. And there's more sunlight here—60 days more each year, they tell me. I love that sunlight and I missed it in Germany.

"When I first came over to join the Symphony here, in 1891, I was brought over by Mr. Nikisch, leaving the famous Gewandthaus orchestra at Leipsic. I knew that they had many excellent 'cellists here who would have made excellent first 'cellists. But when I was asked to come over for that position, I knew at once that this must be a very fine orchestra indeed, if those men did not suffice. And I wasn't disappointed. The Symphony was a great organization, and has been one since.

Changes in Symphony

"There have been changes at the Symphony. There have been little 'interesting times,' and there have been times when a financial deficit has dampened enthusiasm of its most loyal supporters. But I need not tell you how Mr. Higginson always came to its rescue and how little the orchestra had to fear as long as he stood behind it.

"These 20 years that I have spent with the orchestra have been the happiest in my musical life. I leave the orchestra with regret. Just imagine how I shall miss it, and who would not?

"There isn't much to say about my musical career. I began my studies when I was eight years old, and played the viola, violin and piano until I was 20. I played in the opera and the symphony at Berlin in those days.

"At 20 I decided to take up the 'cello, and have made it my instrument ever since. I never had a teacher. I studied it for myself, and learned simply by watching others. In this way I was absolutely independent, and was not hampered by following anyone blindly. Still, in my circle, I had opportunities of studying the playing of fine 'cellists, and in this way got a deeper insight than I might have received through work with with a teacher.

"Since then I have played as a soloist, in the Kneisel Quartet, in other organizations of that sort and in the Symphony. I can't begin to name them all.

"And now I shall form the 'Schroeder Ensemble,' and my two daughters with me. Hedwig will play the piano and Mrs. Schroeder-Bradbury will sing. I shall play the 'cello, of course, and I hope we shall do something of interesting to musicians and the public.

"As to Boston, here I shall live, for I have seen it grow to be the art centre of America, and in 20 years it has made the most rapid strides. I can't live away from it, and won't."

POST, MAY 5, 1912

FAREWELL OVATION TO FIEDLER

Applause and Wreaths for Retiring Symphony Leader

The ovation given Max Fiedler last night in Symphony Hall, when he directed his final symphony concert, was even warmer and more remarkable than the farewell scene at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon.

When the conductor entered, the audience applauded for nearly five minutes. After the Brahms symphony the entire gathering, applauding with the greatest enthusiasm, rose to its feet and stood there for some time while Mr. Fiedler bowed repeatedly. Again there were heard remarks on every side, that it had been years since a symphony conductor had been so honored.

Back of the stage, during the intermission, Mr. Fiedler was met by a delegation of his players, headed by Georges Longy, the first oboe player of the orchestra, who presented the conductor with a silver vase, of an unusually artistic design, bearing the inscription, "In Remembrance, the Boston Symphony Orchestra May 4, 1912." In return, Mr. Fiedler made a short speech to his men, and concluded this speech, not with a farewell, but an "auf wiedersehen."

At the end of the concert two large wreaths were taken forward by the ushers to the conductor's stand, where a third wreath already awaited them. One of these wreaths bore an inscription similar to that on the vase, with the date of its presentation.

Finally, the audience again rose to its feet and applauded until Mr. Fiedler spoke. Mr. Fiedler reiterated the sentiments of farewell that he had expressed the preceding afternoon, but again, and not as on Friday afternoon, he added "Auf Wiedersehen." Mr. Fiedler prefaced this characteristic phrase with words to the effect that he sadly disliked to say farewell, that therefore, if happily he should be missed too much, he would be very glad to return, "and so I add a famous German word, 'auf wiedersehen.'"

Mr. Fiedler had previously gratified the members of his orchestra by informing them that he had been able to secure an additional sum of money for the maintenance of the pension fund.

HERALD, MAY 4, 1912.

FIEDLER BIDS BOSTON ADIEU

Symphony Conductor Presents Brahms and Wagner Program.

LAST PUBLIC REHEARSAL

Makes Short Speech of Farewell to Large Afternoon Audience.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th and last public rehearsal of the 31st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony No. 1, C Minor.....Brahms
Prelude and Liebestod.....Wagner
Funeral March from "Gotterdaemmerung".....Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

The performance of Brahms's symphony was an excellent one, and was musically the feature of the concert, for Mr. Fiedler is especially fortunate in his interpretation of this symphony, the compositions of Strauss and Reger, and the more rugged works of Scandinavian and Russian composers. I do not mean to say that his readings of the earlier classic and the ultra-modern French compositions are not interesting, for this season he gave admirable performances of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Debussy's Nocturnes, but he shines more brilliantly as an interpreter of Strauss than of Wagner. It may here be remarked that Brahms's first symphony and the overture to "Tannhaeuser" were on the program of his first concerts October 9-10, 1908.

The behavior of the audience yesterday afternoon must have convinced Mr. Fiedler, if there had been any doubt in his mind, that the great majority of those that attend the public rehearsals have enjoyed the orchestral performances under his direction and are sincerely sorry to see him go now that his contract has expired. He was applauded most heartily when he took his stand. After the symphony he was recalled more than once and at last the audience stood in his honor.

After the overture to "Tannhaeuser" there was an unusual demonstration. At last, when there was a lull in the applause, Mr. Fiedler spoke a few works simply and from the heart. He thanked the audience for its friendly welcome in 1908 and for its ever-growing sympathy. He was sure that little by little the mysterious, indefinable relationship, "a sort of wireless communication," was established between the conductor and the hearers, which is the most flattering tribute to an artist. And then Mr. Fiedler expressed his regret at leaving the orchestra, now so responsive to his wishes. In closing, he expressed the hope that he would not soon be forgotten.

It was evident at the beginning of the concert that Mr. Fiedler was much moved by the thought of saying "good-by" to many who have supported him loyally; who have recognized his musical earnestness, honesty and enthusiasm; who hold him in high respect and also in affection, as a man, as a human being. Nor is it extravagant, or only a flourish of courtesy, to say that many in the audience were also moved.

Mr. Fiedler came here for one year, to hold the position until Dr. Muck's return. Dr. Muck was bound in honor by his contract in Berlin, and unable to return in 1909. Mr. Fiedler was then re-engaged for one more year. Again Dr. Muck found that he could not honorably obtain his release from the Court at Berlin. Mr. Fiedler was then engaged for a period of two years, and his contract expires with the concert tonight.

No conductor has served more faithfully. He has pleased the audiences in all cities visited by the orchestra, pleased them by the character of his programs and the nature of the performances. This is not the time to discuss analytically his merits, which are patent to all, or certain peculiarities as a conductor, which, while they may provoke the criticism of musicians, appear no doubt to the mass of the hearers as virtues. He may well pride himself on the enthusiasm of the audiences here and elsewhere and on the respect in which he is held by the critical in cities where they are more prone to blame than praise. May his life be a long one of continued usefulness and honor!

The first concerts of the 32d season will take place on Oct. 11 and 12. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The auction sale of seats for the public rehearsals will be held Monday, Sept. 30, and Tuesday, Oct. 1; for the concerts, Thursday, Oct. 3, and Friday, Oct. 4.

[195]

EAGERNESS FOR PROGRESS THE DOMINANT SPIRIT OF AMERICAN AUDIENCES, ACCORDING TO MAX FIEDLER

Boston Orchestra's Departing Conductor Reviews the Experiences of Four Years — Differences Among Audiences of Different Cities—Our Critics Quite as Able as Those in Europe

Bureau of Musical America,
No. 120 Boylston Street,
Boston, April 28, 1912.

"IT has been very interesting to come into contact with representative American audiences in and outside of Boston," said Max Fiedler, who has now concluded his fourth and last season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The audiences differ considerably in their attitude and their tastes from the average European audience. Also in the different cities of America the inclinations of the audiences vary considerably. I should like to know, for instance, if there is any rivalry between Boston and New York. Because I have found from experience that what New York admires Boston is likely to condemn, or only partly commend, and if Boston grows enthusiastic—the opposite is true in New York. Always by contraries. It is not always easy for me to understand these differences. It would be interesting if one could know their causes. There must be reasons, but I have not been able to find them out. If, within each community, there were more individual variance of opinion it would be different, but it has nearly always been that the majority in New York has gone one way and the majority in Boston another."

Mr. Fiedler's remarks were in answer to a question that I had put to him for the second time since his arrival in Boston four years ago. Early in the first season I asked him how his audiences impressed him, and Mr. Fiedler replied, sensibly enough, that he had not had sufficient experience at that time to come to any very definite conclusion on the subject. At the end of his fourth season he had more to say.

"There is one fine thing that I notice everywhere. The people want to know. They want to progress and become acquainted with everything that is best and everything that is new. I have different requests from different cities concerning the programs that we give on tour. Boston is most eager for 'novelties,' new music of all sorts, and just now is perhaps especially interested in French music. I know of no other orchestra with so large and comprehensive a répertoire. The Boston public has grown to demand such a répertoire, while in New York they are perhaps more conservative. In Philadelphia a certain circle is much devoted to Strauss, and every time we go there I get a number of requests for some of the symphonic poems. In Baltimore they cling more closely to the classics. Farther West they seem to have appetites for everything. But wherever one goes the same general spirit is felt. Enthusiasm, what we may call artistic optimism, an eagerness and a readiness to welcome anything that is good, old or new, of whatever school. No musical public with which I have come into contact has a wider acquaintance with and a more genuine interest in the music that is being written. And yet, while I believe the enthusiasm is if anything stronger, the public, especially in Boston, is rather cooler in the expression of its approval than is generally the case in Europe. The people here have not the traditions to look up to that they have abroad, and this may be good for them. They have opinions of their own. In Europe it sometimes takes courage to prepare new works. The public is slower to respond.

Prone to Experiments

"There is the same individuality with the students here. Most of the young men whose compositions I have seen start where Berlioz and Wagner left off! Some of them have amazing knowledge of harmony and orchestration. They are fearless when they write, prone to try plenty of experiments. . . . MacDowell is no doubt [illegible]st composer so far in American musical history. But I think that there is a great deal of talent here. It needs careful development, as it does anywhere."

"What do you think of the state of musical criticism?"

"I think that the best critics in America are fully the equal of those with whose writings I am acquainted in Europe. The reviewers here—the representative ones—are exceedingly well informed in matters relating to their profession. Nearly all of them are excellent writers. I believe, as I have been informed, that this is largely due to the excellent training acquired in the course of American newspaper work. The quickness with which these critics formulate their opinions and express them: quickly, vigorously and clearly, is astonishing to me when I am told the conditions under which such work is done. There are, of course, newspapers that make no pretense of engaging authoritative writers on musical subjects, but this is also often the case in Europe. I repeat, that, in most of these cities, I have read the articles of men who would take fully as high positions in Germany or France as they do here.

"Everywhere critics, like cities, have their different points of view. Some favor one school and some another. I cannot always understand their preferences. I am always surprised, for instance, when I meet again with the old objection, that 'subjective' interpretation of classic masterworks is not legitimate art. How can any true interpretation be otherwise than 'subjective?' Who knows how Beethoven conducted his own symphonies? Is it likely that he, any more than others, would conduct these symphonies in exactly the same way at every performance? And when a pianist offers a new version of some classic he is often praised. Is there any reason why a conductor should not do the same thing? Of course anyone can go too far. One of the first things, one of the fundamentals, in conducting music of the classic period is a fairly strict observance of prescribed tempi. But if the conductor's beat is [illegible] elastic, if he does not feel the stress, the ebb and flow of the music, he is no musician at all. No marks in a score are conclusive. They only give approximately the intention of the composer when he wrote the piece. The thing that matters is what is read between the lines. The rhythmic current must not fluctuate too much in a classic composition, for if this is the case the carefully considered structural proportions of the work may be destroyed; but surely, within these limits, there is a big field for subjective expression, and if the music of Beethoven does not invite subjective treatment, then what music does? I do not say that you play Beethoven as you play Liszt. I say that both men must be felt, and must be made to speak by the conductor who wishes to interpret as well as beat time."

A Period of Growth

Mr. Fiedler spoke with appreciation and gratitude of his stay in Boston, of his personal as well as professional pleasure in his audiences, and their encouraging support, of his pleasure in the quality of the orchestra and its fine library. He spoke of American concert halls and mentioned the acoustics of Carnegie Hall in New York as superior to those of any other auditorium in which he had led the orchestra. He spoke of the enthusiasm, the growing enthusiasm, which had gladdened his heart in the various outside cities visited by the band. It is matter for congratulation that, during Mr. Fiedler's régime, the patronage of the concerts given on tour has grown far past all previous records. In fact, under present conditions it is hardly possible for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to add more concerts to its annual list. The number of the concerts and the scope of the tours have extended each season since Mr. Fiedler arrived. Few symphony conductors have been so popular with the symphony patrons. Few have worked harder and more sincerely to merit that approbation. And the programs themselves, apart from Mr. Fiedler's eclectic tastes and his breadth of view in interpretation, have been the most interesting and well-balanced in many seasons. During his four Winters in Boston Mr. Fiedler has made himself a very firm place in the esteem of his public, and many, keenly admiring the qualities of the musician, will the more keenly feel the departure of the man.

OLIN DOWNES.

—Photo Copyright, Boston Photo News Co.

Conductor Max Fiedler in His Study

TRAVELER,

MAY 4, 1912.

MR. FIEDLER SAYS FAREWELL AT SYMPHONY

By By FRANK BERTWALL.

Seldom, if ever before, has a Boston Symphony orchestra audience accorded a departing conductor such a touching farewell as that given Mr. Fiedler yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall at the final public rehearsal. Mr. Fiedler, in his closing remarks, spoke of there being some sort of a wireless connection between the audience and the conductor. It was plainly in evidence all through the concert, and so noticeably expressed itself at the close that those present will not forget it for many a day. Never has Boston had a Symphony conductor who has given such general satisfaction and so endeared himself to his audience and orchestra.

The concert was an exceptional one in that the programme was a particularly good one and each player seemed determined to make the afternoon memorable. The Weber "Oberon" overture, a gem in its way, was excellently given. The reading of Brahms' C minor symphony was one that could best safely challenge comparison with a recent performance by a visiting orchestra. And so it was through the "Götterdammerung" selection, the "Tristan and Isolde" numbers and the prelude to "Lohengrin." The closing number, the "Tannhauser" overture, was given in a manner that showed what a really great orchestra our organization is.

Although the concert was somewhat long, due in part to the length of the program itself and also in part to the many recalls accorded Mr. Fiedler, the large audience remained at its close, and, all standing, kept on recalling Mr. Fiedler until he yielded to the manifest desire for a few remarks in the way of a farewell.

Mr. Fiedler said: "In thanking you for your good will, I feel two things especially—gratitude for your kindness, and sorrow at leaving. Your warm reception of my work is the greatest tribute of praise that any artist could ask, and I thank you from my heart. What has always been most pleasant here is the contact we have had, and by contact I mean the wireless operation between hearts and souls. This has helped to make the four years that I have spent here the happiest in my life. The orchestra, too, has worked hard under my direction, and responds to my ideas so well that I have felt the greatest joy in leading it. While I am gone I hope that you will keep a little corner for me in your memory;

POST,

APRIL 28, 1912

TONSILITIS KEEPS SOLOIST FROM CONCERT

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Ferls, the first violinist of the orchestra, was prevented from appearing as soloist on account of a sudden attack of tonsolitis. In place of the two pieces which Mr. Ferls had played at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, there was Berlioz' overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," played with much brilliancy. The performance of both the dance of Salome and Debussy's "Nocturnes" were exceptionally fine, and the effect of the last Debussy piece was much enhanced by the singing of 12 members of the Musical Art Club.

GLOBE—APRIL 28, 1912.

Final Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra.

This week brings the final Symphony concerts of the 31st season and the farewell appearances here of Max Fiedler, who for four years has been at the head of the orchestra. Mr and Mrs Fiedler, with their son, who has been with them this year, will sail May 11 from New York by the Prince Friedrich Wilhelm for Bremen.

For this last concert Mr Fiedler will devote himself entirely to well-tried favorites. The first part of the program will comprise the "Oberon" overture of Weber, and Brahms' C minor symphony No. 1.

The second part of the program will be devoted to Wagnerian selections—the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the "Funeral Music" from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

[196]

MAY 4, 1912

BRAHMS AND WAGNER IN CONTRAST

The Boston Symphony orchestra rehearsed its twenty-fourth program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, presenting the following works: Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C-minor, op. 68; Wagner, prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde," funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," prelude to "Lohengrin," overture to "Tannhauser."

The matinee audience was enthusiastic in its applause of Mr. Fiedler, who retires from the Symphony conductorship with the concerts of Friday afternoon and tonight. Both at the intermission and at the close of the program the matinee patrons showed their appreciation with vigorous hand-clapping, and the conductor acknowledged the applause by calling on his men to stand. The symphony wherewith Mr. Fiedler is closing his engagement, the Brahms No. 1, is that with which he began it in the autumn of 1908.

The interpretation of the work today compared with that of four years ago indicates a development in the tone power of the orchestra which must be memorable in the history of music in Boston. According to Mr. Fiedler's idea of tone measurement, the men did not know how to produce a large tone the first time they read this symphony under his baton. That interpretation of 1908 consequently seemed forced. The second movement in particular was ponderous, and as far as could be from ingratiating. But now interpretation is remarkable not only for breadth of sound, but for smoothness of execution too. The andante is no longer labored and impressively dull. It sings along with an ease and a persuasiveness almost Schumannesque. The two inside divisions of the symphony are the most effective in Mr. Fiedler's last reading.

The severe demands of the thematic exposition in the first and last movements are not met by powerful tone and carefully blended colorings. The Boston Symphony orchestra has distinctly declined in expository ability under Mr. Fiedler's administration. And this ability after all is what chiefly wins and holds the intellectual interest of audiences. Nikisch with his orchestra of inferior tone power and quality could take care of the thematic side of the symphonic task in a way to stir and gratify the listener's intellect. And the artistic contents of the masterworks of the orchestral repertory are not to be taken for granted, even in a twenty-four concert a year community such as Boston is.

The Fiedler-developed orchestra of volume and color was nothing short of magnificent in the "Tristan" and "Goetterdaemmerung" music. If ever conductor justified performing Wagner selections in concert, Mr. Fiedler is the man. Orchestral players huddled together in the pit of theater can never do justice to the Wagnerian expression as players on the concert platform can. And the valuable effect of program contrast is lost. Far more potent on Friday was the motive style of Wagnerian composition placed as it was near the Brahms symphonic style, than it ever is when standing by itself.

The twenty-fourth number of the Symphony program book, edited by Philip Hale, brought to the attention of the patrons of the orchestra the works performed during the past year. Among new works that have been presented are the "Jena" symphony, attributed to Beethoven; the second symphony of Elgar and the third of Weingartner. This list does not seem to hold anything epoch-making in orchestral composition. The Elgar work denotes that earnestness of aspiration and clearness of thought are still in place in music. Of the works by composers who affect the program style of expression, the Enesco Rhapsodie Roumaine was perhaps the most appealing. Important among the visiting soloists of the thirty-first season were Mme. Gluck, Josef Hofmann, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Efrem Zimbalist.

The program books have given abundant and illuminating information about the music played and the artists who assisted; and they have been pervaded with the genius of the present musical times. The question must arise with many whether a thematic analysis of the symphonies, such as is given in the program books of the Theodore Thomas orchestra concerts in Chicago and such as was furnished in the shilling books of the Nikisch concerts would not be serviceable. Such an addition to the books would require, to make it of use, a higher lighting of the hall.

It would probably imply a different kind of paper to make the music printing clear. Innovations come slowly in Symphony orchestra management, and the thematic guide would be an innovation requiring a good deal of mechanical reorganization. But it could not fail to enlarge the usefulness of a very useful publication and to make the concerts more intelligible and enjoyable [illegible]

EAGERNESS FOR PROGRESS THE DOMINANT SPIRIT OF AMERICAN AUDIENCES, ACCORDING TO MAX FIEDLER

Boston Orchestra's Departing Conductor Reviews the Experiences of Four Years — Differences Among Audiences of Different Cities—Our Critics Quite as Able as Those in Europe

Bureau of Musical America,
No. 120 Boylston Street,
Boston, April 28, 1912.

"IT has been very interesting to come into contact with representative American audiences in and outside of Boston," said Max Fiedler, who has now concluded his fourth and last season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The audiences differ considerably in their attitude and their tastes from the average European audience. Also in the different cities of America the inclinations of the audiences vary considerably. I should like to know, for instance, if there is any rivalry between Boston and New York. Because I have found from experience that what New York admires Boston is likely to condemn, or only partly commend, and if Boston grows enthusiastic—the opposite is true in New York. Always by contraries. It is not always easy for me to understand these differences. It would be interesting if one could know their causes. There must be reasons, but I have not been able to find them out. If, within each community, there were more individual variance of opinion it would be different, but it has nearly always been that the majority in New York has gone one way and the majority in Boston another."

Mr. Fiedler's remarks were in answer to a question that I had put to him for the second time since his arrival in Boston four years ago. Early in the first season I asked him how his audiences impressed him, and Mr. Fiedler replied, sensibly enough, that he had not had sufficient experience at that time to come to any very definite conclusion on the subject. At the end of his fourth season he had more to say.

"There is one fine thing that I notice everywhere. The people want to know. They want to progress and become acquainted with everything that is best and everything that is new. I have different requests from different cities concerning the programs that we give on tour. Boston is most eager for 'novelties,' new music of all sorts, and just now is perhaps especially interested in French music. I know of no other orchestra with so large and comprehensive a répertoire. The Boston public has grown to demand such a répertoire, while in New York they are perhaps more conservative. In Philadelphia a certain circle is much devoted to Strauss, and every time we go there I get a number of requests for some of the symphonic poems. In Baltimore they cling more closely to the classics. Farther West they seem to have appetites for everything. But wherever one goes the same general spirit is felt. Enthusiasm, what we may call artistic optimism, an eagerness and a readiness to welcome anything that is good, old or new, of whatever school. No musical public with which I have come into contact has a wider acquaintance with and a more genuine interest in the music that is being written. And yet, while I believe the enthusiasm is if anything stronger, the public, especially in Boston, is rather cooler in the expression of its approval than is generally the case in Europe. The people here have not the traditions to look up to that they have abroad, and this may be good for them. They have opinions of their own. In Europe it sometimes takes courage to prepare new works. The public is slower to respond.

Prone to Experiments

"There is the same individuality with the students here. Most of the young men whose compositions I have seen start where Berlioz and Wagner left off! Some of them have amazing knowledge of harmony and orchestration. They are fearless when they write, prone to try plenty of experiments. . . . MacDowell is no doubt [illegible]st composer so far in American musical history. But I think that there is a great deal of talent here. It needs careful development, as it does anywhere."

"What do you think of the state of musical criticism?"

"I think that the best critics in America are fully the equal of those with whose writings I am acquainted in Europe. The reviewers here—the representative ones—are exceedingly well informed in matters relating to their profession. Nearly all of them are excellent writers. I believe, as I have been informed, that this is largely due to the excellent training acquired in the course of American newspaper work. The quickness with which these critics formulate their opinions and express them: quickly, vigorously and clearly, is astonishing to me when I am told the conditions under which such work is done. There are, of course, newspapers that make no pretense of engaging authoritative writers on musical subjects, but this is also often the case in Europe. I repeat, that, in most of these cities, I have read the articles of men who would take fully as high positions in Germany or France as they do here.

"Everywhere critics, like cities, have their different points of view. Some favor one school and some another. I cannot always understand their preferences. I am always surprised, for instance, when I meet again with the old objection, that 'subjective' interpretation of classic masterworks is not legitimate art. How can any true interpretation be otherwise than 'subjective?' Who knows how Beethoven conducted his own symphonies? Is it likely that he, any more than others, would conduct these symphonies in exactly the same way at every performance? And when a pianist offers a new version of some classic he is often praised. Is there any reason why a conductor should not do the same thing? Of course anyone can go too far. One of the first things, one of the fundamentals, in conducting music of the classic period is a fairly strict observance of prescribed tempi. But if the conductor's beat is not elastic, if he does not feel the stress, the ebb and flow of the music, he is no musician at all. No marks in a score are conclusive. They only give approximately the intention of the composer when he wrote the piece. The thing that matters is what is read between the lines. The rhythmic current must not fluctuate too much in a classic composition, for if this is the case the carefully considered structural proportions of the work may be destroyed; but surely, within these limits, there is a big field for subjective expression, and if the music of Beethoven does not invite subjective treatment, then what music does? I do not say that you play Beethoven as you play Liszt. I say that both men must be felt, and must be made to speak by the conductor who wishes to interpret as well as beat time."

A Period of Growth

Mr. Fiedler spoke with appreciation and gratitude of his stay in Boston, of his personal as well as professional pleasure in his audiences and their encouraging support, of his pleasure in the quality of the orchestra and its fine library. He spoke of American concert halls and mentioned the acoustics of Carnegie Hall in New York as superior to those of any other auditorium in which he had led the orchestra. He spoke of the enthusiasm, the growing enthusiasm, which had gladdened his heart in the various outside cities visited by the band. It is matter for congratulation that, during Mr. Fiedler's régime, the patronage of the concerts given on tour has grown far past all previous records. In fact, under present conditions it is hardly possible for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to add more concerts to its annual list. The number of the concerts and the scope of the tours have extended each season since Mr. Fiedler arrived. Few symphony conductors have been so popular with the symphony patrons. Few have worked harder and more sincerely to merit that approbation. And the programs themselves, apart from Mr. Fiedler's eclectic tastes and his breadth of view in interpretation, have been the most interesting and well-balanced in many seasons. During his four Winters in Boston Mr. Fiedler has made himself a very firm place in the esteem of his public, and many, keenly admiring the qualities of the musician, will the more keenly feel the departure of the man.

OLIN DOWNES.

—Photo Copyright, Boston Photo News Co.

Conductor Max Fiedler in His Study

POST,

APRIL 28, 1912

TONSILITIS KEEPS SOLOIST FROM CONCERT

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Feris, the first violinist of the orchestra, was prevented from appearing as soloist on account of a sudden attack of tonsolitis. In place of the two pieces which Mr. Feris had played at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, there was Berlioz' overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," played with much brilliancy. The performance of both the dance of Salome and Debussy's "Nocturnes" were exceptionally fine, and the effect of the last Debussy piece was much enhanced by the singing of 12 members of the Musical Art Club.

GLOBE—APRIL 28, 1912.

Final Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra.

This week brings the final Symphony concerts of the 31st season and the farewell appearances here of Max Fiedler, who for four years has been at the head of the orchestra. Mr and Mrs Fiedler, with their son, who has been with them this year, will sail May 11 from New York by the Prince Friedrich Wilhelm for Bremen.

For this last concert Mr Fiedler will devote himself entirely to well-tried favorites. The first part of the program will comprise the "Oberon" overture of Weber, and Brahms' C minor symphony No. 1.

The second part of the program will be devoted to Wagnerian selections—the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the "Funeral Music" from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

[196]

TRAVELER,

MAY 4, 1912.

MR. FIEDLER SAYS FAREWELL AT SYMPHONY

By By FRANK BERTWALL.

Seldom, if ever before, has a Boston Symphony orchestra audience accorded a departing conductor such a touching farewell as that given Mr. Fiedler yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall at the final public rehearsal. Mr. Fiedler, in his closing remarks, spoke of there being some sort of a wireless connection between the audience and the conductor. It was plainly in evidence all through the concert, and so noticeably expressed itself at the close that those present will not forget it for many a day. Never has Boston had a Symphony conductor who has given such general satisfaction and so endeared himself to his audience and orchestra.

The concert was an exceptional one in that the programme was a particularly good one and each player seemed determined to make the afternoon memorable. The Weber "Oberon" overture, a gem in its way, was excellently given. The reading of Brahms' C minor symphony was one that could safely challenge comparison with a recent performance by a visiting orchestra. And so it was through the "Götterdammerung" selection, the "Tristan and Isolde" numbers and the prelude to "Lohengrin." The closing number, the "Tannhauser" overture, was given in a manner that showed what a really great orchestra our organization [illegible]

Although the concert was somewhat long, due in part to the length of the program and also in part to the many recalls accorded Mr. Fiedler, the large audience remained at its close, and, all standing, kept on recalling Mr. Fiedler until he yielded to the manifest desire for a few remarks in the way of a farewell.

Mr. Fiedler said: "In thanking you for your good will, I feel two things especially—gratitude for your kindness, and sorrow at leaving. Your warm reception of my work is the greatest tribute of praise that any artist could ask, and I thank you from my heart. What has always been most pleasant here is the contact we have had, and by contact I mean the wireless operation between hearts and souls. This has helped to make the four years that I have spent here the happiest in my life. The orchestra, too, has worked hard under my direction, and responds to my ideas so well that I have felt the greatest joy in leading it. While I am gone I hope that you will keep a little corner for me in your memory; [illegible]

MONITOR,

MAY 4, 1912

BRAHMS AND WAGNER IN CONTRAST

The Boston Symphony orchestra rehearsed its twenty-fourth program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, presenting the following works: Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C-minor, op. 68; Wagner, prelude and finale from "Tristan and Isolde," funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," prelude to "Lohengrin," overture to "Tannhauser."

The matinee audience was enthusiastic in its applause of Mr. Fiedler, who retires from the Symphony conductorship with the concerts of Friday afternoon and tonight. Both at the intermission and at the close of the program the matinee patrons showed their appreciation with vigorous hand-clapping, and the conductor acknowledged the applause by calling on his men to stand. The symphony wherewith Mr. Fiedler is closing his engagement, the Brahms No. 1, is that with which he began it in the autumn of 1908.

The interpretation of the work today compared with that of four years ago indicates a development in the tone power of the orchestra which must be memorable in the history of music in Boston. According to Mr. Fiedler's idea of tone measurement, the men did not know how to produce a large tone the first time they read this symphony under his baton. That interpretation of 1908 consequently seemed forced. The second movement in particular was ponderous, and as far as could be from ingratiating. But now interpretation is remarkable not only for breadth of sound, but for smoothness of execution too. The andante is no longer labored and impressively dull. It sings along with an ease and a persuasiveness almost Schumannesque. The two inside divisions of the symphony are the most effective in Mr. Fiedler's last reading.

The severe demands of the thematic exposition in the first and last movements are not met by powerful tone and carefully blended colorings. The Boston Symphony orchestra has distinctly declined in expository ability under Mr. Fiedler's administration. And this ability after all is what chiefly wins and holds the intellectual interest of audiences. Nikisch with his orchestra of inferior tone power and quality could take care of the thematic side of the symphonic task in a way to stir and gratify the listener's intellect. And the artistic contents of the masterworks of the orchestral repertory are not to be taken for granted, even in a twenty-four concert a year community such as Boston is.

The Fiedler-developed orchestra of volume and color was nothing short of magnificent in the "Tristan" and "Goetterdaemmerung" music. If ever conductor justified performing Wagner selections in concert, Mr. Fiedler is the man. Orchestral players huddled together in the pit of theater can never do justice to the Wagnerian expression as players on the concert platform can. And the valuable effect of program contrast is lost. Far more potent on Friday was the motive style of Wagnerian composition placed as it was near the Brahms symphonic style, than it ever is when standing by itself.

The twenty-fourth number of the Symphony program book, edited by Philip Hale, brought to the attention of the patrons of the orchestra the works performed during the past year. Among new works that have been presented are the "Jena" symphony, attributed to Beethoven; the second symphony of Elgar and the third of Weingartner. This list does not seem to hold anything epoch-making in orchestral composition. The Elgar work denotes that earnestness of aspiration and clearness of thought are still in place in music. Of the works by composers who affect the program style of expression, the Enesco Rhapsodie Roumaine was perhaps the most appealing. Important among the visiting soloists of the thirty-first season were Mme. Gluck, Josef Hofmann, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Efrem Zimbalist.

The program books have given abundant and illuminating information about the music played and the artists who assisted; and they have been pervaded with the genius of the present musical times. The question must arise with many whether a thematic analysis of the symphonies, such as is given in the program books of the Theodore Thomas orchestra concerts in Chicago and such as was furnished in the shilling books of the Nikisch concerts would not be serviceable. Such an addition to the books would require, to make it of use, a higher lighting of the hall.

It would probably imply a different kind of paper to make the music printing clear. Innovations come slowly in a Symphony orchestra management, and the thematic guide would be an innovation requiring a good deal of mechanical reorganization. But it could not fail to enlarge the usefulness of a very useful publication and to make the concerts more intelligible and enjoyable to the listeners.

TIGHT BINDING

POST

MAY 4, 1912

FIEDLER'S FAREWELL TO BOSTON

Remarkable Demonstration by Symphony Audience

BY OLIN DOWNES

There was an impressive scene yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall when Max Fiedler, now concluding his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led the band for the last time at a public rehearsal. With the concert this evening Mr. Fiedler's orchestral activities in this country, for the present, will come to an end. Seldom in the history of the orchestra has such a farewell been extended a conductor by the Friday afternoon audience.

In the middle of the concert the audience had signified its intention of honoring Mr. Fiedler by a number of people rising from their seats after the performance of the Brahm's C minor symphony, which completed the first part of the programme. Mr. Fiedler apparently did not notice this as he came back to the stand to acknowledge repeated recalls.

When the final note of the Tannhauser overture had sounded, however, the audience rose to its feet and applauded with the heartest enthusiasm for many minutes. Mr. Fiedler returned to his stand several times, and still the applause continued. Then the conductor stood for several minutes before the people, who gave no sign of desisting until it became apparent that he wished to speak.

When there was silence Mr. Fiedler made a brief and heartfelt speech which, on account of his strong emotion, he had considerable difficulty in delivering, thanking his audience and the orchestra for the support they had given him, and expressing his very genuine regret on leaving the scene of most congenial activities. This speech was interupted several times by applause. Mr. Fiedler recalled his first appearance in Symphony Hall, his initial performance of the third Leonore overture. He said that it was his greatest pleasure to believe that the welcome then extended him had not grown cold—but warmer during the succeeding winters, and that this sincere welcome, "this wireless telegraphy of the heart and the soul," coming over the footlights, meant the greatest reward possible to the artist.

Four Happy Years

"Frankly, I will say to you that these four years I have spent in Boston have been the happiest four years of my life." The obvious sincerity of the remark moved all who listened. Mr. Fiedler thanked his players who, he said, had labored so hard and so patiently with him, and mentioned his increasing pleasure at the greater measure of response that they had given him each succeeding year.

He again thanked from his heart his audience and inspiring listeners and his men who had made such success as he had gained possible, and said in conclusion, "keep a little place for me in your hearts, and do not forget me too soon." He made a gesture as though embracing all present, and there was another moment of applause. The audience had extended Mr. Fiedler the warmest farewell tendered any conductor who has arrived and departed these shores in many years. Neither Dr. Muck nor Mr. Gericke, his two immediate predecessors, were honored in such a degree, and there were old concert goers who did not remember so much demonstration in all their experience of the concerts in Symphony Hall.

The programme of the concert consisted of Weber's Oberon overture, the First Symphony of Brahms, and these pieces by Wagner: the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods"; the prelude to "Lohengrin"; the overture to "Tannhauser." Mr. Fiedler read the symphony with all imaginable sincerity and sympathy, with the fullest comprehension and enthusiasm for the composer's meaning. There were eloquent performances of the Wagnerian excerpts, and where is there more eloquent, more richly expressive music? The programme, consisting of music especially congenial to Mr. Fiedler, was also befitting the occasion, and it was much enjoyed by the audience.

Transcript April 29/12

of the Day

re is no truth whatever in the report, circulated in New York newspapers, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has to engage Mr. Gomez, the first ist of the London Symphony Orches- it has not even remotely considered an engagement. In fact, until the re- appeared, it was nearly unaware of ano's existence.

GLOBE—MAY 5, 1912

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Final Concert Given This Afternoon.

Review of the Season's Works and Performers.

Bonci and Kubelik Return "Pops" Again—Notes.

The concert season of 1911-1912 will end this afternoon with the joint appearance of Mr Bonci and Mr Kubelik at Symphony Hall. It began, as it invariably begins in Boston, with the first pair of Symphony concerts, which took place Oct 6 and 7.

During the Symphony season the following 16 novelties were performed. Throughout this review, three stars following a date denotes a performance for the first time anywhere, two stars for the first time in America, and one star the first time in Boston. The dates below are those of the public rehearsals.

Balakireff, overture on a theme of a Spanish march, Nov 24.*
Bantock, poem for orchestra, "Dante and Beatrice," Oct 27.
Beethoven (sic), "Jena" symphony; edited by Fritz Stein), Dec 29.
Cherubini, overture to the opera "Lodoiska," Oct 27 (first time at these concerts).
Converse, symphonic poem, "Ormasd," Feb 9.*
Delius, "In a Summer Garden," April 19.*
Elgar, 2d symphony, in E flat, Dec 1.*
Enesco, Rhapsodie Roumaine, A major, op. 11, No. 1, Feb 16.*
Foote, four character pieces, April 19.*
Glasounoff, concerto for violin and orchestra, op. 82.* (Efrem Zimbalist soloist, first appearance in Boston.)
Grieg, Old Norwegian Romance with variations, op. 51, Nov 17.*
Reger, A Comedy Overture, op. 120, Oct 6.
Sibelius, "Karelia," overture for orchestra, op. 10, Nov 17.*
Strauss, Salome's Dance, April 26.
Wallace, "Villon," symphonic poem, April 19.*
Weingartner, 3d symphony in E major, op. 49, March 8*.

The list is not one of marked distinction. Beyond Delius' piece of considerable imagination, neither Elgar's prolix and soporific symphony, Reger's lusty overture, the puerile "Jena" strangely saddled onto Beethoven, or Mr Weingartner's symphony, delinquent in invention and coherence, are worth a place in the repertory.

Mr Foote's character sketches and William Wallace's "Villon," adjacent on the same program, were quite the most interesting of the new works. The first, unpretentious, not to exhibit musical learning, yet done with a deft hand and true imagination; the latter an admirable piece of genre painting, displaying a due sense of color and of the rhapsodical. Some frowned at its incoherence, but Villon thrived, thieved and poetized rather by intuition and impulse than by reasoning.

There were three occasions of a special nature at these concerts, Oct 13, the commemoration of the 30th anniversary of the first public rehearsal and concert of the orchestra, which took place Oct 21 and 22, 1881; on Oct 20, the celebration of the centenary of Liszt's birth, and April 26 the playing of the funeral march from the "Eroica" as a tribute to Titanic's dead.

The soloists were as follows:

Oct 6, Mme Gluck; Oct 20, Mr Gans; Oct 27, Efrem Zimbalist; Nov 17, Mme Schumann-Heink; Nov 24, Mr Bauer; Dec 1, Miss Parlow; Dec 15, Mr Schroeder; Dec 29, Mme Morens; Jan 5, Josef Hofmann; Jan 19, Mr Witek; Jan 26, Miss Goodson; Feb 9, Mr Warnke; Feb 16, Miss Gerhardt; March 1, Mr Gebhard; March 8, Mme Powell; March 15, Mr Bachaus; March 29, Miss Collier (in place of Mr Noack, who had suffered an accident); April 19, Mr Noack; April 26, Mr Ferir (in April 27). Mmes Gluck, Gerhardt and Collier and Mr Bachaus appeared for the first time at these concerts; Mr Zimbalist for the first time in Boston.

The orchestra gave two concerts for the pension fund. The soloist Nov 26 was Mme Schumann-Heink, and March 3 Miss Gerhardt.

Mr Fiedler as Conductor.

The concert last night terminated Mr Fiedler's four years' term of directorship. As a maker of programs he has been catholic of taste and generous in sympathy. He has not been tardy in the choice and performance of novelties, nor has he neglected the classics for the modern programists. He has extended a kind hand to the downtrodden American composer, and has not hesitated to recognize native talent, even though in a manner sometimes counter to the orchestra's traditions.

As a conductor of Strauss, he has given performances which, while appropriately virile, were not lacking in sensibility. The realization of power residing in the virtuosity of such an orchestra is a possession amounting to plausible intoxication in a conductor. By such means the spiritual import has often been obscured by sheer physical vigor.

TRAVELER

APRIL 27, 1912.

LAST SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Mr. Fiedler's last and farewell programme which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, is made up entirely of well-tried favorites. The first part of the programme will comprise the "Oberon" overture of Weber and the C minor symphony of Brahms. The second part of the programme will be devoted to Wagner, the selections being the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan und Isolde," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

GLOBE—MAY 4, 1912

FIEDLER'S FAREWELL.

Conductor Gets Rousing Demonstration.

Finally Makes Speech of Thanks in Excellent English.

Mr Fiedler conducted the last public Symphony rehearsal of this season, and of his present directorship, yesterday afternoon. The spirit of demonstration was upon the audience. When the conductor appeared and took the stand there was long-continued applause. It was resumed with ardor before the intermission and came to a climax of enthusiasm after the "Tannhauser" overture at the end of the program. The audience then stood applauding insistently for many minutes until it became evident that Mr Fiedler was waiting for an opportunity to be heard.

When the hand clapping had ceased, he spoke in clear and excellent English his appreciation and thanks. He said there were two thoughts uppermost in his mind, one of deep gratitude for this cordiality, and the other his regret at his departure from Boston and its superb orchestra.

"I thank you for your kindness and sympathy which you have expressed from the day of my first concert here," continued the conductor. "It is my conviction that has been even a deeper bond than your good will, for there have been times when we here upon the stage," (turning toward the players) "have felt a certain wireless telegraphy, as I might say, which established a common sympathy—" and the speaker was interrupted by hearty applause.

"I say it frankly," resumed Mr Fiedler, "these four years have been the happiest of my experience. I have enjoyed so much this splendid orchestra; the men have worked so patiently and have come to respond to me so closely, and now I regret to leave them. I hope that you will all keep a little corner in your hearts for me and that you will not forget me too soon," and waving a "goodby" the conductor thus took leave of his Friday afternoon audience, which stood further expressing its good will and best wishes.

The program began with the overture to "Oberon." This was followed by Brahms' first symphony. Wagner numbers were played after the intermission, the prelude and Love's Death from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Mr Fiedler included the first symphony of Brahms in his first program in Boston, Oct 9, 1908. There were indications yesterday of the greater appreciation for lyric expressiveness which he has acquired during this sojourn. It was a pleasure to hear the exquisite art of Mr Longy (oboe), Mr Grisez (clarinet), Mr Maquarre (flute) and Mr Witek (violin). Such playing all but reconciles one to this music. The insecure attack of the first trombone in the brief measures of choral in the last movement was unfortunate. The tone is the most difficult one of the instrument's upper register. The player yesterday was not Mr Hampe, who is principal of the group.

Mr Fiedler will be remembered gratefully by a wide public for his democratic programs, for his impartiality of taste in schools and nationalities, for his generous recognition of a much abused American art, and for his courtesy in a disposition to share public praise with his men. Musically he has grown in discernment and in appreciation of some of the subtler sources of interpretative beauty. Perhaps at some future visit to Boston he will have acquired greater discretion in other matters. Unless he fortunately fall heir to another orchestra of equal virtuosity, he may modify his tempi, not only in the Oberon overture, but in the riotous orgies of the Venusberg. If in truth Tannhauser lived at such a pace, his desire for the reposeful sounds of Spring and vesper bells was a likely one.

The "Pops" will begin Monday night. A review of the concert season will be printed in these columns tomorrow morning.

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 29, 1912

Symphony Hall: Strauss and Debussy

PERHAPS blessings brighten as they take their flight, and so the public of the Symphony Concerts is going more numerously to them on Saturday evenings than it did in the middle of the season. Perhaps the dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named opera and Debussy's Nocturnes, unheard here for two years and never before heard here in such understanding and imparting performance, quickened interest too. Whatever the cause, the audience on Saturday evening was unusually large and interested, and while it regretted the absence of Mr. Ferir, compelled by illness to forego the solo pieces for viola that he had played on Friday, it did not lack sufficient pleasure It was particularly hearty in its applause for Strauss's dance, and appreciative of the Nocturnes, though still a little shy with them. Yet to accustomed or unaccustomed ears, to the yielding or the questioning imagination, the images of "Clouds" and the song of "Sirens," changeful as passing lights upon the sea, must have seemed beautiful music—with a new, strange, rare beauty that has widened and heightened the suggestion of tones and the appreciating faculty of those that hear them. With no shyness at all, the listeners seemed to feel the power of Strauss's music for Salome's dance—its command over all the elements of orchestral expression, the breadth, depth and force of some of its melodies, its fierce or langourous intensities of mood and climax, its graphic assembling and imparting of the moment in the music-drama and of the moment in Salome's musico-dramatic existence. It is the weary custom to say that music is barren, relatively, in this generation of ours. Yet has not Debussy added new and strange beauties to it, and Strauss new and graphic powers?

MONITOR,

APRIL 27, 1912

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, gave its twenty-third public rehearsal in Symphony hall Friday afternoon, presenting the following program: Wagner—a Faust overture, a Siegfried idyl; Cecil Forsyth, "Chant Celtique" for viola and orchestra (first time at these concerts); Strube, fantastic dance for viola and orchestra; Debussy, three nocturnes—"Clouds," "Festivities," "Sirens" (chorus of "Sirens" sung by the Musical Art Club); Strauss, Salome's dance from the opera, "Salome" (first time in Boston). The soloist in the two numbers for viola and orchestra was Emile Ferir, who holds the same position among the viola section of the orchestra that Mr. Witek, the concert-master, holds among the violins. The program was preluded by the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, in memoriam April 14, 1912.

The program was of an unusually mixed character for a piece of Fiedler workmanship, but it was all interesting and well arranged. Each of the short selections was evidently prepared with minute care. A concert by the Flonzaley quartet would hardly have more delicate detail, more precise definition of mood. The most important pieces of music were the Siegfried Idyl, the nocturnes and Salome's dance. These tested the technique of the orchestra in three characteristic modern types of scoring and they tested the conductor in as many styles of expression. Mr. Fiedler's success in the interpretations must have been a surprise to those who think his powers find their scope only in the 50-minute symphony. The Boston Symphony orchestra seemed like a new found means of voicing the thought of the community. A performance like that of Friday was something to make a listener believe that the players have hitherto disclosed but a fraction of their talents. It was certainly enough to prove that the conventional program of big symphony, showy concerto and stock overture is not the only thing that can reach the public.

The Strauss music brought to notice the possibilities of the waltz rhythm in the modern orchestra of vast color resource. The composer discloses a genius for the picturesque and dramatic far beyond anything hinted at in the scoring of his predecessors. The ideas are traceable to the Viennese writers of dance music. They borrow nothing from the opera composers of Paris, early or late. The pedigree of the music runs back to the dance tunes which the romantic rhythmists of a century ago set the waltzers of Vienna a-playing. The central European origin of the music is recognizable in every phrase. Oriental it is not.

The music of Debussy was exquisitely, almost fantastically read in its appropriate atmospheric manner. The soprano voices in the third nocturne did not blend with such fine effect into the orchestral tone as did the voices in the same composer's "Saint Sebastian" music, recently produced at the Boston opera house under the direction of Mr. Caplet. But the Symphony conductor cannot command vocal resources comparable with his instrumental. The singing of the members of the Musical Art Club was of good quality, considering the choral community is resting on its oars.

Mr. Ferir, the viola soloist, had his proper opportunity on this program. The tact of Mr. Fiedler for grouping unusual pieces so they will sound well was never better illustrated. A symphony of any kind on the program would have made the solo viola works sound weak by comparison. Preceded by the light Wagnerian selections and followed by the tenuous Nocturnes, they were in a most advantageous position. It goes without saying that the orchestral accompaniment of the viola must be thin and monotonous.

Wood-wind echoings and pizzicati encouragings are the stock devices of tonal background for the weakest of solo instruments. Mr. Ferir's playing and the special descriptive intent of the music are the things to regard. The soloist performed like one who valued the special color quality of the viola and knew that there were no honors for it as a singer of bravura melody. His reading of his pieces had interest and appeal. It spoke a fair word for an instrument that few appreciate the purpose of in the orchestra and it gave sympathetic presentation of the thought of two minor poets of tone.

[197].

JOURNAL

APRIL 27, 1912

FUNERAL MARCH AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston First to Pay Musical Tribute to Titanic Victims.

Boston is the first city in the country to pay a musical tribute to the memory of the heroes and heroines who went down with the Titanic. The place of honor on this week's Symphony program is occupied by the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. Yesterday a little round of applause followed the performance of the mighty march in which, according to some, Beethoven has provided a panegyric for Napoleon.

This next to the last program offered by Max Fiedler abounds in contrasts. Aside from the Funeral March, the most striking feature is Salome's Dance from the Strauss opera, whose performance was forbidden in this city after some mysterious woman had telephoned City Hall to say how shocked a second cousin of hers had been when she witnessed the opera on gay Broadway. This prohibition was followed by vulgar burlesque performances at which the authorities winked. The result was that until yesterday this wonderfully vivid dance music from the most powerful opera of the new century had never been performed here. The performance was brilliant—like the music itself.

Emile Ferir, the modest, gifted first violinist of the orchestra, is the soloist of the twenty-third pair of concerts. His ripe art and mellow tone distinguished the performance of Forsyth's "Chant Celtique" and Strube's "Fantastic Dance." After the second number Mr. Ferir hid himself away in the orchestra. Mr. Strube shared the applause with him, and he merited the honor, for this "Fantastic Dance" is one of his most fascinating compositions.

The Debusy Nocturnes and Wagner's "Faust" Overture and "Siegfried Idyl" complete the program, which will be performed again tonight. The Chorus of Sirens in the third Nocturne is sung by the Musical Art Club.

POST, APRIL 28, 1912

Last Symphony Concerts

This week brings the final Symphony concerts of the 21st season and the farewell appearances here of Max Fiedler, who for four years has been at the head of the orchestra. Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler with their son who has been with them this year will sail on May 11 from New York by the Prince Friedrich Wilhelm for Bremen.

For his last concert Mr. Fiedler will devote himself entirely to well tried favorites. The first part of the programme will comprise the "Oberon" overture of Weber and Brahms' C minor Symphony No. 1. The second part of the programme will be devoted to Wagnerian selections—the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

The programme of the concert of the Symphony Orchestra given in Cambridge consisted of Brahms' Second Symphony, Vieuxtemps' violin concerto in D minor, op. 31, and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." Miss Irma Seydel, the 13 or 14-year-old daughter of Mr. T. Seydel, the double bass player of the Symphony Orchestra, was the soloist and her dress had been lengthened in order to conform with the ritual of the occasion, which prohibited the appearance of soloists in short skirts! Miss Seydel has been for years one of the most promising pupils of Mr. Charles M. Loeffler, and although she has played more brilliantly than she did last Thursday night, her performance again proved her indisputable talent and the admirable training by which she has profited so greatly. Miss Seydel played the old fashioned concerto with a rare and commanding sense of style, with authority and fire, and her tone in cantilena passages was warm and rich. In spite of what may have been a certain trepidation due to the occasion, she tossed off certain passages of bravura with all of the sureness and freedom of a matured virtuoso. After the performance she was recalled about half a dozen times. The performances of the Brahms Symphony and of Strauss' tone-poem were of a nature to reflect exceeding credit upon Mr. Fiedler and his players, and after the concert there was a demonstration for the leader, who had appeared for the last time for some seasons before a Cambridge audience. Not the least of Mr. Fiedler's welcome observances have been his encouragement of native talent, whether the possessors were performers or composers, and seldom, indeed, has the encouragement which he has been given been misplaced.

HERALD, MAY 5, 1912.

By PHILIP HALE.

The musical season of 1911-12 ended last night with the 24th Symphony concert. Outside of the Symphony concerts and the performances of the Boston Opera Company, the season was not an eventful one. There were few compositions of compelling merit produced. With the exception of the performance of the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, the concerts of choral societies were of little importance. Few distinguished virtuosos visited this city. Some of the best were pitiably neglected. Free tickets were often distributed to "dress the house." Notably in the case of the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, the London Symphony Orchestra, the Cecilia Society and certain pianists and singers.

Symphony Concert Programs

One hundred and five works, including concertos, arias and songs were performed at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The composers represented were: Anonymous 1 (the "Jena" Symphony fondly attributed by some to Beethoven), Bach 1, Balakireff 1, Bantock 1, Beethoven 11, Berlioz 3, Boellmann 1, Bossi 1, Brahms 5, Bruch 4, Bruckner 1, Charpentier 1, Cherubini 1, Chopin 1, Converse 1, Debussy 3, Delius 1, Dvorak 1, Elgar 1, Enesco 2, Foote 1, Forsyth 1, Franck 1, Glazounoff 1, Gluck 1, Goetz 1, Grieg 1, Haydn 1, d'Indy 1, Lalo 1, Liszt 6, Mendelssohn 2, Mozart 5, Rachmaninoff 1, Rimsky-Korsakoff 1, Roger 1, Schubert 2, Schumann 3, Sibelius 2, Smetana 1, Strauss 6, Strube 2, Tschaikowsky 3, Wagner 10, Wallace 1, Weber 3, Weingartner 1, Wolf 3.

Beethoven leads with 11 compositions, not including the "Jena" symphony. Then comes Wagner 10, Liszt 6, Strauss 6, Mozart 5, Brahms 5, Bruch 4 (all for virtuosos—singer, violinists and 'cellist), Berlioz, Debussy, Schumann, Tschaikowsky, Weber 3 apiece, and Hugo Wolf with 3 songs.

Forty-seven composers and one unknown were represented. The names of Boellmann, Forsyth, Wallace, appeared for the first time on a Symphony program.

It would not be easy to classify the composers by nationality. Enesco, a Roumanian by birth, has lived for many years in Paris. Delius, of German parentage but born in England, has long lived in France. Is Cherubini to be ranked with Italians or French? Is Strube to be classed with Germans or Americans? Liszt is both Hungarian and German. Franck was a Frenchman only by education and naturalization.

Putting Germans and Austrians together there were 17 Germans and one unknown, probably a German, represented with 62 compositions.

One Hungarian with six.
Two Bohemians with two.
Two Scandinavians with three.
Five Russians with seven.
One Roumanian with two.
One Pole with one.
Two Italians (Bossi and Cherubini) with two.
Seven Frenchmen with 11.
Five English with five.
Three Americans (including Strube) with four.

Works New to Boston

These works were performed for the first time in Boston:

SYMPHONIES.

Anonymous—"Jena" Symphony, C major, attributed to Beethoven, Dec. 30, 1911.
Elgar—Symphony in E-flat major, No. 2, op. 63, Dec. 2, 1911.
Weingartner—Symphony, in E major, No. 3, op. 49, March 9, 1912..... 3

SYMPHONIC POEMS.

Bantock—"Dante and Beatrice," Oct. 28, 1911.
Converse—"Ormazd," Feb. 10, 1912.
Delius—"In a Summer Garden," April 20, 1912.
Wallace—"Villon," symphonic poem No. 6, April 20, 1912..... 4

SUITES, RHAPSODIES, ETC.

Enesco—Rhapsodie Roumaine, A major, op. 11, No. 1, Feb. 17, 1912.
Foote—Four Character Pieces, op. 48, April 20, 1912.
Grieg—Old Norwegian Romance with Variations, op. 51, Nov. 18, 1911.
Strauss—Salome's Dance, from "Salome," April 27, 1912..... 4

OVERTURES.

Balakireff—Overture on a Theme of a Spanish March, Nov. 25, 1911.
Reger—Comedy Overture, op. 120 (first performance anywhere), Oct. 7, 1911.
Sibelius—"Karelia," op. 10, Nov. 18, 1911... 3

CONCERTOS.

Glazounoff—Concerto for violin, op. 82 (Efrem Zimbalist), Oct. 28, 1911..... 1

15

New at Symphony Concerts

These orchestral pieces, concertos, arias, songs, etc., were performed for the first time at these concerts:

ORCHESTRAL PIECES, ETC.

Boellmann—Symphonic variations for solo violoncello and orchestra, op. 23 (Alwin Schroeder), Dec. 16, 1911.
Cherubini—Overture to "Lodoiska," Oct. 28, 1911.
Forsyth—Chant Celtique for viola and orchestra (Emile Ferir), April 26, 1912.
Mozart—Concerto for violin, D major, No. 4, K. 218 (Sylvain Noack), April 20, 1912.. 4

ARIAS AND SONGS.

Charpentier—Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" (Alma Gluck), Oct. 7, 1911.
Liszt—Song, "Die drei Zigeuner" (Ernestine Schumann-Heink), Nov. 18, 1911.
Mozart—Aria, "Con vezzie, con lusinghe," from "Il Seraglio" (Alma Gluck), Oct. 7, 1911.
Wolf—Song, "Der Freund," with orchestral accompaniment (Elena Gerhardt), Feb. 17, 1912.
Song—"Verborgenheit," with orchestral accompaniment (Elena Gerhardt), Feb. 17, 1912..... 5

List of Soloists

The soloists were these:

Sopranos: Elena Gerhardt (Feb. 17), Alma Gluck (Oct. 7), Berta Morena (Dec. 30). Three in all.

Contralto: Ernestine Schumann Heink (Nov. 18).

Violinists: Mmes. Collier (March 30), Parlow (Dec. 2), Powell (March 9); Messrs. Noack (April 20), Witek (Jan. [illegible]), Zimbalist (April 26).

'Cellists: Messrs. Schroeder (Dec. 16), Warnke (Feb. 10).

Pianists: Miss Goodson (Jan. 27); Messrs. Bachaus (March 16), Bauer (Nov. 25), Ganz (Oct. 21), Gebhard (March 2), Hofmann (Jan. 6). Six in all.

Nineteen soloists and of them Mmes. Gerhardt, Gluck and Collier and Messrs. Zimbalist and Bachaus played at these concerts for the first time.

The Musical Art Club assisted in the performance of Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, solo by Mrs. Marie Sundelius, and Debussy's Nocturne "Sirens."

Notes and Comments

No one of the three new symphonies made a profound impression. It matters not who wrote the "Jena," so-called. It might have been written by any second or third rate composer of the period. Elgar's symphony shows little inspiration. It is self-complacent music laboriously contrived. Weingartner's, written for a huge orchestra, is for the most part perfunctory, without individuality, without marked distinction of any sort.

Mr. Converse's "Ormazd" has poetical pages. Mr. Foote's unpretentious pieces have exotic but true charm. "In a Summer Garden," an imaginative and sensuously beautiful composition, assured us that Delius has rare talent, which was not displayed in other compositions of a dry or crabbed idiom played in seasons before. Wallace's "Villon" is an uncommon work, ingenious, fanciful, original, with new ideas expressed in an unexpected and effective manner. It is one of the most interesting of the modern compositions heard here of recent years. Glazounoff's concerto made little effect at the time in spite of Mr. Zimbalist's masterly performance and was at once forgotten. The other pieces heard for the first time have little significance. The Dance of Salome loses when taken from the opera house.

The list of soloists was not uniformly of so high a standard as those of former years. The singing of Mmes. Gerhardt and Gluck and the playing of Mmes. Parlow and Powell and Messrs. Bauer, Ferir, Hofmann, Noack, Warnke, Witek and Zimbalist were conspicuous features. Miss Collier is not yet ripe for an appearance at these concerts, and why should we be obliged to hear Miss Goodson every time this industrious pianist visits the United States?

There were noteworthy orchestral performances. Those of "Scheherazade," Elgar's second symphony (a case of love's labor lost), Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, Rachmaninoff's Symphony and Debussy's Nocturnes were especially conspicuous.

As before, Mr. Fiedler was fortunate in the interpretation of compositions by Strauss and Tschaikowsky, but he showed another side and excited lively admiration by his appreciation of Debussy's Nocturnes.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 27, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. FIEDLER'S LEAVE-TAKING AND A SPEECH

The Simple and Sincere Words in Which the Conductor Parted from His Friday Audiences—The Applause That Warranted Them—Brahms, Weber and Wagner for the Final Programme—A Concert That Was a Little Epitome of the Orchestra's and the Conductor's Qualities

In one respect—and indeed in most respects—Mr. Fiedler's leave-taking of the audience of Friday afternoons, at the Symphony Concert yesterday, fulfilled expectations. He made the anticipated speech, and speeches from conductors in opera house or concert-room are a strange new thing in America. Few of them command English enough to make the venture safely. Still fewer, accustomed to speak through their music and their orchestra rather than by word, dare to risk it. Mr. Damrosch has long had a practical monopoly of such speech-making, and he has usually exercised it in preliminary explanation of novel music. Mr. Fiedler first trenched upon the field when he made a little speech of thanks after he had conducted for the last time in New York. Yesterday, conducting for the last time before one of his publics here, he did likewise. The concert had ended. On his stand the conductor had first received the plaudits of the lingering audience. Then he had gone a little slowly and sorrowfully, as it seemed by his springless step and his bent head, to his room. Renewed applause recalled him to the stage. According to his custom at a second and a third recall, he bade the orchestra rise behind him to receive it. Meanwhile a considerable part of the audience on the floor had pressed forward toward the stage, while in the balconies many stood facing it.

There was a pause almost of expectancy, and then Mr. Fiedler, in easily comprehensible and idiomatic English, made a very simple and sincere little speech. He spoke of the work he had accomplished in his four years with the Symphony Orchestra as the most exacting and the most fruitful undertaking of his life. He thanked the public of the Symphony Concerts for its appreciation of all that he had done and tried to do. He heaped praise upon the orchestra for its share in all the achievement. He spoke a few honest and regretful words about his going. Full-voiced applause answered him, and the audience and orchestra began to depart. Plainly stirred by conflicting emotions, Mr. Fiedler, on his way to the conductor's room, did not look back. Throughout the concert applause had been plentiful and general—particularly long when he came to his place, hearty after each item of the programme, heartiest of all at the end of the first and the opening movement of Brahms's symphony in C minor. Once more, and for almost the last time, Mr. Fiedler could know and feel the general liking for him, the general appreciation of his best and distinctive qualities as a conductor.

The concert ran through a full two hours, yet the departures before the end were unusually few—and they have been fewer generally through Mr. Fiedler's conductorship than they ever were before. All of the pieces on the programme were very familiar: the overture that Weber wrote to his opera, "Oberon," Brahms's symphony in C minor, and, from Wagner, the preludes to "Tristan" and to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tannhäuser" and the music that laments and glorifies the dead Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung." Weber's overture served for the highly colored romantic music that Mr. Fiedler loves and in which some of his best traits shine. The symphony of Brahms is one of his most masterful and eloquent performances, one in which he first proved his mettle in Boston, in which he has ripened in the four years of his stay, and in which the orchestra is a very responsive instrument to every one of his wishes and purposes. To many of his hearers, in those same four years, the preludes and the usual excerpts from Wagner's operas and music-dramas have not seemed music in which Mr. Fiedler excels. In all his career he has been a conductor of concerts and of nothing else, and he lacks the operatic accent that Wagner's music insistently exacts. The overture to "Tannhäuser" is the music-drama in epitome as it is to be played out on the stage. The prelude to "Lohengrin" is the weaving of the romantic, remote, mysterious glamor that should suffuse the imagination in the theatre while the opera runs its course. The apotheosis of Siegfried is more than a lament and a glorification in the power and the magnificance of tones. It is the irresistible and inevitable climax, for the time, of a whole music-drama, of a whole series of music-dramas. The prelude to "Tristan" yoked with Isolde's final song is the passion and fate of the music-drama sublimated, concentrated. As some like to believe, it might be played as postlude rather than prelude. It is this piercing accent, this enveloping glamor of the theatre, that Mr. Fiedler has failed steadily to gain in the music of Wagner. He misses too many of what an actor would call its "points." His phrases never cut, his climaxes, labor as he may with them, never surge and sweep. There are the form, the substance, the color of the music, but not its unique, penetrating and exciting voice. Call it, if you will, the shrill, flaming, neurotic voice of the theatre—but it is a voice that Mr. Fiedler has never heard. On the one hand, he does not do justice to Wagner. On the other, Wagner's music does not do justice to him.

Throughout the concert the orchestra once more affirmed those enduring qualities which make half the glories of the conductors who one after another succeed to it. Seldom have the horns seemed more dusky and mysterious of tone than in the first measures of the overture to "Oberon." They were the voice of the strangeness of romance as the strings were soon to be of its warmth and brilliance. The ardor, the glamor of the music were in the playing of it. Next the orchestra preached very eloquently the new gospel of Brahms—the emphasized, almost the dramatized Brahms, as the present generation of conductors work their will with his music. The most zealous—and among them is Mr. Fiedler—could hardly have asked for more incisive strings, for more strenuous and reiterated drum-beats, for more songful horns, for a brass that now insinuated and now proclaimed, for more exciting pizzicati at the beginning of the finale, for more out-breathing wood-winds, as in the duet of oboe and clarinet, winding through the grave melody, the grave contemplation of the slow movement. All things bit or all things swelled as the way now is with the music of Brahms. (In the Elysian fields does he gladly hear it so played? One wonders and wonders). The power of the orchestra, which Mr. Fiedler has so developed, told in the great climaxes of Isolde's death-song, and again in Siegfried's music wherein to power was added a sombre and passionate magnificence. The path of the grail in the Prelude to "Lohengrin" was a way of shimmering and sustained song. The Overture to "Tannhäuser" lacked neither the holy sonorities of the pilgrims nor the un-holy bite and riot of its Venusberg. A single voice, outshining most tenors, might have been singing the song to the goddess. Once more, the conductors come and the conductors go; their fortunate possession is the orchestra that lasts in all its virtues.

As it should be, finally, the concert seemed a little epitome of Mr. Fiedler's traits as a conductor. Unevenly as ever, at one extreme was his curiously obtuse and distorting "reading" of Isolde's death-song, warping its melodic line, losing its transcendent eloquence in petty episodes. At the other was Brahms's symphony revealed, animated, almost transformed—if the listener agrees to the present fashion with his music—by the insight, the imagination, the divining, revealing, upbuilding power of the conductor. Here was the symphony in C minor now thickened to the utmost harmonic richness and now dissected into the utmost sharpness of line and bite of detail. Here was Brahms speaking in the big tone dear to contemporary singers and conductors both, rising to orchestral tumults, achieving dramatic suspensions, mounting to exuberant and triumphant song, lingering in long-drawn and gravely pondering voice through his andante—Brahms in short endlessly modulated, moulded, diversified, colored, until hardly a rhythm, a phrase, a voice, a contrast or transition seems untouched. It was all very big, very intensive, very emphatic, very eloquent and exciting. It was high-powered, highly colored. Incessantly busy conducting, achieving its full effect in broad and deep tonal mass, in sharp tonal detail. The interpreter interpreted. The music yielded much to him and to his hearers. Somebody once called Brahms's music autumnal; Mr. Fiedler makes it glow like summer with the heat of his interpretative en-between those two extremes was the romantic gusto, the sense of musical the old the revitalizing force with which Mr. Fiedler took the overture to "Oberon," and therein also was his liking for exceedingly and excessively fast pace. If he missed the creating and the unifying song—the great upbuilding and revealing melody—of the music to Tristan, if he frittered it away in phrases that were never poignant, his feeling for euphonious, sensuously lovely and expressive tone sustained in instrumental song told in the prelude to "Lohengrin." He could release the tonal power, the tonal magnificence, the clanging climaxes that he loves in the music of Siegfried. And the more emphasis, the more contrast, the more color, and the more sonority, the better for the overture to "Tannhäuser." To the last note of the last measure Mr. Fiedler remained as he has been from the first here, a striking conductor—by his virtues and by his shortcomings.

H. T. P.

MR. FIEDLER'S VALEDICTORY

An Interview in Which the Conductor Speaks of His American Experiences—Audiences Here and Abroad—Musical Criticism in America—Praise for the Orchestra

"It has been very interesting to come into contact with representative American audiences in and outside of Boston," said Mr. Fiedler, the other day, to a correspondent of Musical America. "The audiences differ considerably in their attitude and their tastes from the average European audience. Also in the different cities of America the inclinations of the audiences vary considerably. I should like to know, for instance, if there is any rivalry between Boston and New York. Because I have found from experience that what New York admires Boston is likely to condemn, or only partly commend, and if Boston grows enthusiastic—the opposite is true in New York. Always by contraries. It is not always easy for me to understand these differences. It would be interesting if one could know their causes. There must be reasons, but I have not been able to find them out. If, within each community, there were more individual variance of opinion it would be different, but it has nearly always been that the mapority in New York has gone one way and the majority in Boston another.

"There is one fine thing that I notice everywhere. The people want to know. They want to progress and become acquainted with everything that is best and everything that is new. I have different requests from different cities concerning the programmes that we give on tour. Boston is most eager for 'novelties,' new music of all sorts, and just now is perhaps especially interested in French music. I know of no other orchestra with so large and comprehensive a répertoire. The Boston public has grown to demand such a répertoire, while in New York they are perhaps more conservative. In Philadelphia a certain circle is much devoted to Strauss, and every time we go there I get a number of requests for some of the symphonic poems. In Baltimore they cling more closely to the classics. Farther West they seem to have appetites for everything.

Wherever one goes the same general spirit is felt. Enthusiasm, what we may call artistic optimism, an eagerness and a readiness to welcome anything that is good, old or new, of whatever school. No musical public with which I have come into contact has a wider acquaintance with and a more genuine interest in the music that is being written. And yet, while I believe the enthusiasm is if anything stronger, the public, especially in Boston, is rather cooler in the expression of its approval than is generally the case in Europe. The people here have not the traditions to look up to that they have abroad, and this may be good for them. They have opinions of their own. In Europe it sometimes takes courage to prepare new works. The public is slower to respond.

"There is the same individuality with the students here. Most of the young men whose compositions I have seen start where Berlioz and Wagner left off! Some of them have amazing knowledge of harmony and orchestration. They are fearless when they write, prone to try plenty of experiments.

MacDowell is no doubt the greatest composer so far in American musical history. But I think that there is a great deal of talent here. It needs careful development, as it does anywhere.

"I think that the best critics in America are fully the equal of those with whose writings I am acquainted in Europe. The reviewers here—the representative ones—are exceedingly well informed in matters relating to their profession. Nearly all of them are excellent writers. I believe, as I have been informed, that this is largely due to the excellent training acquired in the course of American newspaper work. The quickness with which these critics formulate their opinions and express them: quickly, vigorously and clearly, is astonishing to me when I am told the conditions under which such work is done. There are, of course, newspapers that make no pretence of engaging authoritative writers on musical subjects, but this is also often the case in Europe. I repeat, that, in most of these cities, I have read the articles of men who would take fully as high positions in Germany or France as they do here.

"Everywhere critics, like cities, have their different points of view. Some favor one school and some another. I cannot always understand their preferences. I am always surprised, for instance, when I meet again with the old objection, that 'subjective' interpretation of classic masterworks is not legitimate art. How can any true interpretation be otherwise than 'subjective'? Who knows how Beethoven conducted his own symphonies? Is it likely that he, any more than others, would conduct these symphonies in exactly the same way at every performance? And when a pianist offers a new version of some classic he is often praised. Is there any reason why a conductor should not do the same thing?

"Of course anyone can go too far. One of the first things, one of the fundamentals, [illegible] in a fairly strict observance of [illegible] tempi. But if the conductor's beat is elastic, if he does not feel the strict ebb and flow of the music, he is no musician at all. No marks in a score are conclusive. They only give approximately the intention of the composer when he wrote the piece. The thing that matters is what is read between the lines. The rhythmic current must not fluctuate too much in a classic composition, for if this is the case the carefully considered structural proportions of the work may be destroyed; but surely, within these limits, there is a big field for subjective expression, and if the music of Beethoven does not invite subjective treatment, then what music does? I do not say that you play Beethoven as you play Liszt. I say that both men must be felt, and must be made to speak by the conductor who wishes to interpret as well as beat time."

HERALD,

MAY 5, 1912.

By PHILIP HALE.

The musical season of 1911-12 ended last night with the 24th Symphony concert. Outside of the Symphony concerts and the performances of the Boston Opera Company, the season was not an eventful one. There were few compositions of compelling merit produced. With the exception of the performance of the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto the concerts of choral societies were of little importance. Few distinguished virtuosos visited this city. Some of the best were pitiably neglected. Free tickets were often distributed to "dress the house." Notably in the case of the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, the London Symphony Orchestra, the Cecilia Society and certain pianists and singers.

Symphony Concert Programs

One hundred and five works, including concertos, arias and songs were performed at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The composers represented were Anonymous 1 (the "Jena" Symphony fondly attributed by some to Beethoven), Bach 1, Balakireff 1, Bantock 1, Beethoven 11, Berlioz 3, Boellmann 1, Bossi 1, Brahms 5, Bruch 4, Bruckner 1, Charpentier 1, Cherubini 1, Chopin 1, Converse 1, Debussy 3, Delius 1, Dvorak 1, Elgar 1, Enesco 2, Foote 1, Forsyth 1, Franck 1, Glazounoff 1, Gluck 1, Goetz 1, Grieg 1, Haydn 1, d'Indy 1, Lalo 1, Liszt 6, Mendelssohn 2, Mozart 5, Rachmaninoff 1, Rimsky-Korsakoff 1, Roger 1, Schubert 2, Schumann 3, Sibelius 2, Smelana 1, Strauss 6, Strube 2, Tschaikowsky 3, Wagner 10, Wallace 1, Weber 3, Weingartner 1, Wolf 3.

Beethoven leads with 11 compositions, not including the "Jena" symphony. Then comes Wagner 10, Liszt 6, Strauss 6, Mozart 5, Brahms 5, Bruch 4 (all for virtuosos—singer, violinists and 'cellist), Berlioz, Debussy, Schumann, Tschaikowsky, Weber 3 apiece, and Hugo Wolf with 3 songs.

Forty-seven composers and one unknown were represented. The names of Boellmann, Forsyth, Wallace, appeared for the first time on a Symphony program.

It would not be easy to classify the composers by nationality. Enesco, a Roumanian by birth, has lived for many years in Paris. Delius, of German parentage but born in England, has long lived in France. Is Cherubini to be ranked with Italians or French? Is Strube to be classed with Germans or Americans? Liszt is both Hungarian and German. Franck was a Frenchman only by education and naturalization.

Putting Germans and Austrians together there were 17 Germans and one unknown, probably a German, represented with 62 compositions.

One Hungarian with six.
Two Bohemians with two.
Two Scandinavians with three.
Five Russians with seven.
One Roumanian with two.
One Pole with one.
Two Italians (Bossi and Cherubini) with two.
Seven Frenchmen with 11.
Five English with five.
Three Americans (including Strube) with four.

Works New to Boston

These works were performed for the first time in Boston:

SYMPHONIES.

Anonymous—"Jena" Symphony, C major, attributed to Beethoven, Dec. 30, 1911.
Elgar—Symphony in E-flat major, No. 2, op. 63, Dec. 2, 1911.
Weingartner—Symphony, in E major, No. 3, op. 49, March 9, 1912..... 3

SYMPHONIC POEMS.

Bantock—"Dante and Beatrice," Oct. 28, 1911.
Converse—"Ormazd," Feb. 10, 1912.
Delius—"In a Summer Garden," April 20, 1912.
Wallace—"Villon," symphonic poem No. 6, April 20, 1912..... 4

SUITES, RHAPSODIES, ETC.

Enesco—Rhapsodie Roumaine, A major, op. 11, No. 1, Feb. 17, 1912.
Foote—Four Character Pieces, op. 48, April 20, 1912.
Grieg—Old Norwegian Romance with Variations, op. 51, Nov. 18, 1911.
Strauss—Salome's Dance, from "Salome," April 27, 1912..... 4

OVERTURES.

Balakireff—Overture on a Theme of a Spanish March, Nov. 25, 1911.
Roger—Comedy Overture, op. 120 (first performance anywhere), Oct. 7, 1911.
Sibelius—"Karelia," op. 10, Nov. 18, 1911... 3

CONCERTOS.

Glazounoff—Concerto for violin, op. 82 (Efrem Zimbalist), Oct. 28, 1911..... 1

15

New at Symphony Concerts

These orchestral pieces, concertos, arias, songs, etc., were performed for the first time at these concerts:

ORCHESTRAL PIECES, ETC.

Boellmann—Symphonic variations for solo violoncello and orchestra, op. 23 (Alwin Schroeder), Dec. 16, 1911.
Cherubini—Overture to "Lodoiska," Oct. 28, 1911.
Forsyth—Chant Celtique for viola and orchestra (Emile Ferir), April 26, 1912.
Mozart—Concerto for violin, D major, No. 4, K. 218 (Sylvain Noack), April 20, 1912.. 4

ARIAS AND SONGS.

Charpentier—Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" (Alma Gluck), Oct. 7, 1911.
Liszt—Song, "Die drei Zigeuner" (Ernestine Schumann-Heink), Nov. 18, 1911.
Mozart—Aria, "Con vezzie, con lusinghe," from "Il Seraglio" (Alma Gluck), Oct. 7, 1911.
Wolf—Song, "Der Freund," with orchestral accompaniment (Elena Gerhardt), Feb. 17, 1912.
Song—"Verborgenheit," with orchestral accompaniment (Elena Gerhardt), Feb. 17, 1912..... 5

List of Soloists

The soloists were these:

Sopranos: Elena Gerhardt (Feb. 17), Alma Gluck (Oct. 7), Berta Morena (Dec. 30). Three in all.

Contralto: Ernestine Schumann Heink (Nov. 18).

Violinists: Mmes. Collier (March 30), Parlow (Dec. 2), Powell (March 9); Messrs. Noack (April 20), Witek (Jan. 9), Zimbalist (Oct. 28). Six in all.

Violist: Mr. Ferir (April 26).

'Cellists: Messrs. Schroeder (Dec. 16), Warnke (Feb. 10).

Pianists: Miss Goodson (Jan. 27); Messrs. Bachaus (March 16), Bauer (Nov. 25), Ganz (Oct. 21), Gebhard (March 2), Hofmann (Jan. 6). Six in all.

Nineteen soloists and of them Mmes. Gerhardt, Gluck and Collier and Messrs. Zimbalist and Bachaus played at these concerts for the first time.

The Musical Art Club assisted in the performance of Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, solo by Mrs. Marie Sundelius, and Debussy's Nocturne "Sirens."

Notes and Comments

No one of the three new symphonies made a profound impression. It matters not who wrote the "Jena," so-called. It might have been written by any second or third rate composer of the period. Elgar's symphony shows little inspiration. It is self-complacent music laboriously contrived. Weingartner's, written for a huge orchestra, is for the most part perfunctory, without individuality, without marked distinction of any sort.

Mr. Converse's "Ormazd" has poetical pages. Mr. Foote's unpretentions pieces have exotic but true charm. "In a Summer Garden," an imaginative and sensuously beautiful composition, assured us that Delius has rare talent, which was not displayed in other compositions of a dry or crabbed idiom played in seasons before. Wallace's "Villon" is an uncommon work, ingenious, fanciful, original, with new ideas expressed in an unexpected and effective manner. It is one of the most interesting of the modern compositions heard here of recent years. Glazounoff's concerto made little effect at the time in spite of Mr. Zimbalist's masterly performance and was at once forgotten. The other pieces heard for the first time have little significance. The Dance of Salome loses when taken from the opera house.

The list of soloists was not uniformly of so high a standard as those of former years. The singing of Mmes. Gerhardt and Gluck and the playing of Mmes. Parlow and Powell and Messrs. Bauer, Ferir, Hofmann, Noack, Warnke, Witek and Zimbalist were conspicuous features. Miss Collier is not yet ripe for an appearance at these concerts, and why should we be obliged to hear Miss Goodson every time this industrious pianist visits the United States?

There were noteworthy orchestral performances. Those of "Scheherazade," Elgar's second symphony (a case of love's labor lost), Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, Rachmaninoff's Symphony and Debussy's Nocturnes were especially conspicuous.

As before, Mr. Fiedler was fortunate in the interpretation of compositions by Strauss and Tschaikowsky, but he showed another side and excited lively admiration by his appreciation of Debussy's Nocturnes.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 27, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. FIEDLER'S LEAVE-TAKING AND A SPEECH

The Simple and Sincere Words in Which the Conductor Parted from His Friday Audiences—The Applause That Warranted Them—Brahms, Weber and Wagner for the Final Programme—A Concert That Was a Little Epitome of the Orchestra's and the Conductor's Qualities

In one respect—and indeed in most respects—Mr. Fiedler's leave-taking of the audience of Friday afternoons, at the Symphony Concert yesterday, fulfilled expectations. He made the anticipated speech, and speeches from conductors in opera house or concert-room are a strange new thing in America. Few of them command English enough to make the venture safely. Still fewer, accustomed to speak through their music and their orchestra rather than by word, dare to risk it. Mr. Damrosch has long had a practical monopoly of such speech-making, and he has usually exercised it in preliminary explanation of novel music. Mr. Fiedler first trenched upon the field when he made a little speech of thanks after he had conducted for the last time in New York. Yesterday, conducting for the last time before one of his publics here, he did likewise. The concert had ended. On his stand the conductor had first received the plaudits of the lingering audience. Then he had gone a little slowly and sorrowfully, as it seemed by his springless step and his bent head, to his room. Renewed applause recalled him to the stage. According to his custom at a second and a third recall, he bade the orchestra rise behind him to receive it. Meanwhile a considerable part of the audience on the floor had pressed forward toward the stage, while in the balconies many stood facing it.

There was a pause almost of expectancy, and then Mr. Fiedler, in easily comprehensible and idiomatic English, made a very simple and sincere little speech. He spoke of the work he had accomplished in his four years with the Symphony Orchestra as the most exacting and the most fruitful undertaking of his life. He thanked the public of the Symphony Concerts for its appreciation of all that he had done and tried to do. He heaped praise upon the orchestra for its share in all the achievement. He spoke a few honest and regretful words about his going. Full-voiced applause answered him, and the audience and orchestra began to depart. Plainly stirred by conflicting emotions, Mr. Fiedler, on his way to the conductor's room, did not look back. Throughout the concert applause had been plentiful and general—particularly long when he came to his place, hearty after each item of the programme, heartiest of all at the end of his and the orchestra's full-throated and impassioned performance of Brahms's symphony in C minor. Once more, and for almost the last time, Mr. Fiedler could know and feel the general liking for him, the general appreciation of his best and distinctive qualities as a conductor.

The concert ran through a full two hours, yet the departures before the end were unusually few—and they have been fewer generally through Mr. Fiedler's conductorship than they ever were before. All of the pieces on the programme were very familiar: the overture that Weber wrote to his opera, "Oberon," Brahms's symphony in C minor, and, from Wagner, the preludes to "Tristan" and to "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tannhäuser" and the music that laments and glorifies the dead Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung." Weber's overture served for the highly colored romantic music that Mr. Fiedler loves and in which some of his best traits shine. The symphony of Brahms is one of his most masterful and eloquent performances, one in which he first proved his mettle in Boston, in which he has ripened in the four years of his stay, and in which the orchestra is a very responsive instrument to every one of his wishes and purposes. To many of his hearers, in those same four years, the preludes and the usual excerpts from Wagner's operas and music-dramas have not seemed music in which Mr. Fiedler excels. In all his career he has been a conductor of concerts and of nothing else, and he lacks the operatic accent that Wagner's music insistently exacts. The overture to "Tannhäuser" is the music-drama in epitome as it is to be played out on the stage. The prelude to "Lohengrin" is the weaving of the romantic, remote, mysterious glamor that should suffuse the imagination in the theatre while the opera runs its course. The apotheosis of Siegfried is more than a lament and a glorification in the power and the magnificance of tones. It is the irresistible and inevitable climax, for the time, of a whole music-drama, of a whole series of music-dramas. The prelude to "Tristan" yoked with Isolde's final song is the passion and fate of the music-drama sublimated, concentrated. As some like to believe, it might be played as postlude rather than prelude. It is this piercing accent, this enveloping glamor of the theatre, that Mr. Fiedler has failed steadily to gain in the music of Wagner. He misses too many of what an actor would call its "points." His phrases never cut, his climaxes, labor as he may with them, never surge and sweep. There are the form, the substance, the color of the music, but not its unique, penetrating and exciting voice. Call it, if you will, the shrill, flaming, neurotic voice of the theatre—but it is a voice that Mr. Fiedler has never heard. On the one hand, he does not do justice to Wagner. On the other, Wagner's music does not do justice to him.

Throughout the concert the orchestra once more affirmed those enduring qualities which make half the glories of the conductors who one after another succeed to it. Seldom have the horns seemed more dusky and mysterious of tone than in the first measures of the overture to "Oberon." They were the voice of the strangeness of romance as the strings were soon to be of its warmth and brilliance. The ardor, the glamor of the music were in the playing of it. Next the orchestra preached very eloquently the new gospel of Brahms—the emphasized, almost the dramatized Brahms, as the present generation of conductors work their will with his music. The most zealous—and among them is Mr. Fiedler—could hardly have asked for more incisive strings, for more strenuous and reiterated drum-beats, for a brass that now insinuated and now proclaimed, for more exciting pizzicati at the beginning of the finale, for more out-breathing wood-winds, as in the duet of oboe and clarinet, winding through the grave melody, the grave contemplation of the slow movement. All things bit or all things swelled as the way now is with the music of Brahms. (In the Elysian fields does he gladly hear it so played? One wonders and wonders). The power of the orchestra, which Mr. Fiedler has so developed, told in the great climaxes of Isolde's death-song, and again in Siegfried's music wherein to power was added a sombre and passionate magnificence. The path of the grail in the Prelude to "Lohengrin" was a way of shimmering and sustained song. The Overture to "Tannhäuser" lacked neither the holy sonorities of the pilgrims nor the un-holy bite and riot of its Venusberg. A single voice, outshining most tenors, might have been singing the song to the goddess. Once more, the conductors come and the conductors go; their fortunate possession is the orchestra that lasts in all its virtues.

As it should be, finally, the concert seemed a little epitome of Mr. Fiedler's traits as a conductor. Unevenly as ever, at one extreme was his curiously obtuse and distorting "reading" of Isolde's death-song, warping its melodic line, losing its transcendent eloquence in petty episodes. At the other was Brahms's symphony revealed, animated, almost transformed—if the listener agrees to the present fashion with his music—by the insight, the imagination, the divining, revealing, upbuilding power of the conductor. Here was the symphony in C minor now thickened to the utmost harmonic richness and now dissected into the utmost sharpness of line and bite of detail. Here was Brahms speaking in the big tone dear to contemporary singers and conductors both, rising to orchestral tumults, achieving dramatic suspensions, mounting to exuberant and triumphant song, lingering in long-drawn and gravely pondering voice through his andante—Brahms in short endlessly modulated, moulded, diversified, colored, until hardly a rhythm, a phrase, a voice, a contrast or transition seems untouched. It was all very big, very intensive, very emphatic, very eloquent and exciting. It was high-powered, highly colored, incessantly busy conducting, achieving its full effect in broad and deep tonal mass, in sharp tonal detail. The interpreter interpreted. The music yielded much to him and to his hearers. Somebody once called Brahms's music autumnal; Mr. Fiedler makes it glow like summer with the heat of his interpretative energy.

Between these two extremes stood the romantic gusto, the sense of musical rhetoric, the revitalizing force with which Mr. Fiedler took the overture to "Oberon," and therein also was his liking for exceedingly and excessively fast pace. If he missed the creating and the unifying song—the great upbuilding and revealing melody—of the music to Tristan, if he frittered it away in phrases that were never poignant, his feeling for euphonious, sensuously lovely and expressive tone sustained in instrumental song told in the prelude to "Lohengrin." He could release the tonal power, the tonal magnificence, the clanging climaxes that he loves in the music of Siegfried. And the more emphasis, the more contrast, the more color, and the more sonority, the better for the overture to "Tannhäuser." To the last note of the last measure Mr. Fiedler remained as he has been from the first here, a striking conductor—by his virtues and by his shortcomings.

H. T. P.

MR. FIEDLER'S VALEDICTORY

An Interview in Which the Conductor Speaks of His American Experiences—Audiences Here and Abroad—Musical Criticism in America—Praise for the Orchestra

"It has been very interesting to come into contact with representative American audiences in and outside of Boston," said Mr. Fiedler, the other day, to a correspondent of Musical America. "The audiences differ considerably in their attitude and their tastes from the average European audience. Also in the different cities of America the inclinations of the audiences vary considerably. I should like to know, for instance, if there is any rivalry between Boston and New York. Because I have found from experience that what New York admires Boston is likely to condemn, or only partly commend, and if Boston grows enthusiastic—the opposite is true in New York. Always by contraries. It is not always easy for me to understand these differences. It would be interesting if one could know their causes. There must be reasons, but I have not been able to find them out. If, within each community, there were more individual variance of opinion it would be different, but it has nearly always been that the mapority in New York has gone one way and the majority in Boston another.

"There is one fine thing that I notice everywhere. The people want to know. They want to progress and become acquainted with everything that is best and everything that is new. I have different requests from different cities concerning the programmes that we give on tour. Boston is most eager for 'novelties,' new music of all sorts, and just now is perhaps especially interested in French music. I know of no other orchestra with so large and comprehensive a répertoire. The Boston public has grown to demand such a répertoire, while in New York they are perhaps more conservative. In Philadelphia a certain circle is much devoted to Strauss, and every time we go there I get a number of requests for some of the symphonic poems. In Baltimore they cling more closely to the classics. Farther West they seem to have appetites for everything.

Wherever one goes the same general spirit is felt. Enthusiasm, what we may call artistic optimism, an eagerness and a readiness to welcome anything that is good, old or new, of whatever school. No musical public with which I have come into contact has a wider acquaintance with and a more genuine interest in the music that is being written. And yet, while I believe the enthusiasm is if anything stronger, the public, especially in Boston, is rather cooler in the expression of its approval than is generally the case in Europe. The people here have not the traditions to look up to that they have abroad, and this may be good for them. They have opinions of their own. In Europe it sometimes takes courage to prepare new works. The public is slower to respond.

"There is the same individuality with the students here. Most of the young men whose compositions I have seen start where Berlioz and Wagner left off! Some of them have amazing knowledge of harmony and orchestration. They are fearless when they write, prone to try plenty of experiments. . . . MacDowell is no doubt the greatest composer so far in American musical history. But I think that there is a great deal of talent here. It needs careful development, as it does anywhere.

"I think that the best critics in America are fully the equal of those with whose writings I am acquainted in Europe. The reviewers here—the representative ones—are exceedingly well informed in matters relating to their profession. Nearly all of them are excellent writers. I believe, as I have been informed, that this is largely due to the excellent training acquired in the course of American newspaper work. The quickness with which these critics formulate their opinions and express them: quickly, vigorously and clearly, is astonishing to me when I am told the conditions under which such work is done. There are, of course, newspapers that make no pretence of engaging authoritative writers on musical subjects, but this is also often the case in Europe. I repeat, that, in most of these cities, I have read the articles of men who would take fully as high positions in Germany or France as they do here.

"Everywhere critics, like cities, have their different points of view. Some favor one school and some another. I cannot always understand their preferences. I am always surprised, for instance, when I meet again with the old objection, that 'subjective' interpretation of classic masterworks is not legitimate art. How can any true interpretation be otherwise than 'subjective'? Who knows how Beethoven conducted his own symphonies? Is it likely that he, any more than others, would conduct these symphonies in exactly the same way at every performance? And when a pianist offers a new version of some classic he is often praised. Is there any reason why a conductor should not do the same thing?

"Of course anyone can go too far. One of the first things, one of the fundamentals, in the music of the classic period in a fairly strict observance of prescribed tempi. But if the conductor's beat is not elastic, if he does not feel the stress, the ebb and flow of the music, he is no musician at all. No marks in a score are conclusive. They only give approximately the intention of the composer when he wrote the piece. The thing that matters is what is read between the lines. The rhythmic current must not fluctuate too much in a classic composition, for if this is the case the carefully considered structural proportions of the work may be destroyed; but surely, within these limits, there is a big field for subjective expression, and if the music of Beethoven does not invite subjective treatment, then what music does? I do not say that you play Beethoven as you play Liszt. I say that both men must be felt, and must be made to speak by the conductor who wishes to interpret as well as beat time."

[198]

TRANSCRIPT, MAY 4, 1912

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAUSS, WAGNER, DEBUSSY AND MISCELLANY

An Afternoon of High Pleasure from Conductor, Orchestra and Music—Salome's Dance Shifted from the Opera House to the Concert Hall and So Only Half Itself —Debussy's Nocturnes Beautifully Performed—Other Intimate Music—Mr. Ferir and the Viola

THE weeks come and the weeks go, and conductors and orchestras change with them, so that one element of saving variety in our long series of Symphony Concerts is the diversity of quality that Mr. Fiedler and the band reveal in them. A week ago, he seemed no more than an intelligent, painstaking, open-minded and generally efficient conductor, while the orchestra played somewhat coarsely and mechanically. Nowhere was there much regard for quality of tone, for delicately sustained mood, for finesse of accent. Yesterday in a programme that ranged from the romantic and orotund Wagner of the "Faust" overture to the visionary and vaporous Debussy of The Nocturnes, from the intimate and whispering "Siegfried Idyl" to the clamorous and biting dance of Salome in Strauss's music-drama, Mr. Fiedler seemed a very discriminating, apprehending and imparting conductor, who found for each piece its animating and characterizing voice, who held to its peculiar atmosphere and its particular suggestion. Pace, accent, adjustments and above all, the quality of the orchestral tone were altogether just. Mr. Fiedler's ear seemed as finely attuned to it as Mr. Gericke's used to be. The men of the band became as by one accord little masters of the blendings and the shadings of sound.

The "Faust" overture had its true restlessness of contending voices, its sombre color shot with gleams of suffusing melody. The "Siegfried Idyl," though a large orchestra was playing it in a great concert-room, kept its intimate note, its refinement of phrase, its gentle brightness of changing color. For once it was not inflated into a tone-poem, for once it sounded like a lyric fancy. In turn, the conductor and the orchestra kept Debussy's Nocturnes beautifully vaporous, glamorous, plastic, fanciful. They, too, with such quality of tone and such poetry of accent, did not sound like pieces of the concert-hall, but like flitting images and visions to which tones gave momentary form, substance, color. And when the women's voices of the Musical Art Club joined the orchestra in the Nocturne of the Sirens, the quality of their tone was beautifully sympathetic to the remote and passing music and beautifully euphonious to the ear more of the glamoring flutes and clarinets. Then, in the dance of Salome, the conductor and the orchestra gained all the intensities of rhythm, all the force of melody, all the glitter of color, and excitement of sensation with which Strauss has written this music.

And in all this and in the two solo pieces for viola that Mr. Férir played there was nothing but wholly unobtrusive proof of individual virtuosity. There week after week on the stage sit Mr. Férir with his friends Mr. Maquarre with his flute, Mr. Longy with his clarinet, Mr. Witek in his concert-master's chair. We listen and take them for granted. Then we hear other wind players, other flutists and clarinetists, other concert-masters, know that they are good, but know also how wide is the gulf that separates them from the little masters of our own band. It was good that Mr. Férir and Mr. Maquarre and Mr. Grisez should so stand out in the concert of yesterday and Mr. Witek had had like advantage in the performance of "Ein Heldenleben" the evening before in Cambridge. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will surpass themselves if their final concerts next week match that of yesterday in fulness of accomplishment and fineness of pleasure.

Who has forgotten those horrible perils mental, moral and spiritual corruption which the censors of our musical and theatrical pleasures, who knew not a line of Wilde's play or a measure of Strauss's music, delivered us what time Mr. Hammerstein purposed to perform "Salome" at the Boston Theatre? Who does not recall the revolt of those same moralists from details of instrumental and harmonic suggestion that they, being wiser in these than in music-drama, believed were being put out upon the stage? Some of them, whose recollection does not slip, occurred in the dance of Salome. It was played yesterday for the first time in Boston; it was played with the utmost of the expressive quality of the music, apart from its place in the crime-drama and the visible action and environment of the stage; it was played for fifteen corrupting minutes. Yet the strictest matrons and the tenderest maidens remained in their places through it all, then applauded, departed, and as they passed through the doors of Symphony Hall seemed no other to themselves or to be else than what they had been when they entered them. Truly, the corrupting influence of "Salome" is insidious—so insidious that it is sometimes hard for the unmoral mind to apprehend.

The real truth is that the dance is music the scene and ill bears shifting to the concert-room. To have musico-dramatic character, to seem more than a curious experiment in orchestration, it must come in its place in the cumulative suspense of the drama. We must see the great terrace of the palace, the prophet's cistern, the starlight, Salome dancing, the glowering crowd, shaken, tortured, almost writhing under her beauty. In the theatre the dance is musico-dramatic, more dramatic than musical and those who know "Salome" in place and integrity found themselves inevitably involuntarily trying to reconcile the scene. Do what they would, they could not hear the music quite as music. Hence, in such a performance as Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra gave of the dance heard its languorous or its whipping melodies; its sweeps of passionate motion and its titillating pauses; its incessant and nervous rhythmic excitements; its leaps and jets of instrumental color; its blinding flash of trills at the end. They may have suspected that in the complex fabric of the music were woven endless suggestion of Salome and her traits, of the drama that was rising to climax. They heard Strauss's music in its integrity, in its power of imagination and expression; but they heard it without its animating reason for being—the drama. In the concert-room, like all good opera, it can be only half itself.

Salome's Dance and the "Faust" overture aside, the concert consisted wholly of intimate music, so that Mr. Fiedler was again the shrewd and sensitive programme-maker when he let Wagner's piece begin it and Strauss's end it. The ghost of Liszt is known to haunt Wagner's music on occasion, and it haunts this "Faust" overture by right of much finer achievement in the species. For of all the music of the concert-room that Goethe's poem has suggested, none—not even Schumann's—bears comparison with Liszt's "Faust" symphony. Therein are Faust, Mephistopheles, and Gretchen embodied and characterized in tones as they have been nowhere else. Therein is hint, so far as tones may give it, of the celestial and philosophic, the earthly and the human substance of the poem. Already this "Faust" symphony seems Liszt's fullest and highest achievement. Already it makes other symphonic exercises upon the Faust legend and Goethe's poem seem either mere episodes or mere studies. Wagner's overture falls readily into the latter category. It is a study in the delineation in tones of Faust's restless, striving, tortured and tireless mind and spirit. Musically and poetically, it is vividly delineative, truly characterizing, romantically colored music that holds its own today in a highly developed species. Yet beside Liszt's symphony it seems no more than a preliminary study for a great musico-poetic scheme. Wagner dreamed of it; Liszt achieved it.

The rest of the concert was intimate. They say that Humperdinck wrote "Hänsel and Gretel" to amuse the children of his household—who must have expected much of their elders. It is a fact that Wagner wrote the "Siegfried Idyl" to be music for Cosima's birthday and for their new-born son in the villa in which they were living. The outside world quickly took Humperdinck's opera and Wagner's Idyl to itself, thrust Hänsel and Gretel into great theatres and turned the music of the little band on the staircase in the villa into a piece for big orchestras in symphony concerts. Happy the conductor and the orchestra who can subdue the tone, lighten the instrumental colors, and keep the music running so brightly and plastically that it shall seem, as it did yesterday, the play of fancies, the hints of work done and to be done, the reflection of happiness, the joys of hopes fulfilled that only Wagner and his Cosima in their solitude could fully feel and understand. Then the Siegfried Idyl cases to seem long-drawn or mannered, and becomes the music of half-secret emotion whispered into the ear.

Debussy's Nocturnes, in spite of the louder climacteric passage in the midst of "Fetes," are a whispered music, too, and now the wise among an audience hear them with an ear single to their beauty of tonal image and suggestion. The Nocturnes are twelve years old now; and they seem even older, so fast have the open and the sensitively minded advanced in comprehending responsiveness to Debussy's music. Nobody now hears them—or ought to hear them—with controversial thought about Debussyan whole-tone scales, harmonic procedure, juxtaposed chords and all the rest. These new resources in the hands of those that can use them have widened the expressive means and amplified the colorful diversity of music. The revolution, as some over-heatedly chose to call it, has justified itself, because it has opened the way in music to new beauty, to new tonal suggestion, to new voices that are rare and lovely in themselves. The Nocturnes, to which few listen now awkwardly, have their right to existence by the same title—the suggestion and the achievement of a strange, new beauty; the translation into tones of such evasive things as sound, light and their motion; the making of a music of glamorous and evanescent image. They are music, too, of a rare and pervading sensuousness. It is in the languorous and aerated suggestion of the slowly gathering passing, vanishing clouds in the first Nocturne—music of the stillness and the monotony of the heavens. It is in the fitful and idealized intoxication to the sensibilities of the march and the dances of light and star-dust in the Nocturne of "Fetes." Above all, it is in the Nocturne of "The Sirens" with its rising, falling, passing voices, heard out of the foam of the sea, yet vanishing when a glint of starlight or a ray of phosphorescence touches the curling wave. The sea-drift passes; the ship goes with it; the song is stilled. Not even Franck's music seems so to vaporize itself into silence.

Intimate, finally, was Mr. Férir's playing of the viola in Mr. Forsyth's "Celtic Song" and Mr. Strube's "Fantastic Dance." Neither piece has too much intrinsic interest, though Mr. Strube's has far more musical and imaginative substance and diversity than Mr. Forsyth's amiable and ambling song. Both serve the viola well and under Mr. Férir's hand it becomes not merely a colorful element in the strong choir, but a fascinating and an individual instrumental voice. The violin shimmers or the violin penetrates. The viola is a graver voice with deeper lustres. It insinuates the beauty and the suggestion of its plaintive tone. The tone of 'cellos and basses is often deep and heavy. The tone of viola has the richness of old wine, long casked—a woody richness. Beyond the clarinet, it is the voice of melancholy musing. Beyond the oboe, it can weave its fine, clear thread of sound into the tonal web. Or it is so when Mr. Férir plays it with a grave perfection that seems to caress it, with an unconsciousness of himself and of his hear-

HERALD, APRIL 27, 191

NOCTURNES ARE EXQUISITE

Symphony's Performance of Debussy's Works One Long to Be Remembered.

TRIBUTE TO TITANIC DEAD

Salome's Dance, Heard Here for First Time, Loses Effect by Isolation.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 23d public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Emile Ferir, first viola of the orchestra, was the soloist. Members of the Music Art Club sang the vocal parts in Debussy's Nocturne, "Sirens." The program was as follows:

Funeral March, from the "Eroica" Symphony ..... Wagner
A Faust Overture ..... Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl ..... Wagner
Chant Celtique for viola and orchestra, ... Forsyth Fantastic Dance for viola and orchestra, ... Strube
Three Nocturnes ..... Debussy
Salome's Dance, from "Salome" ..... Strauss

Beethoven's Funeral March was played in memory of those lost on the Titanic. As has unfortunately been the case whenever a musical tribute of this character has been paid in the past at these concerts, there were restless souls in the audience that applauded without thought of the incongruity.

The music of Salome's Dance in Richard Strauss's opera was played for the first time in this city. How the opera itself was announced for performance at the Boston Theatre and how the performance was prevented will form one of the most entertaining chapters in "The Comic History of Boston." When the music of this dance is played in concert without the scenic accessories, without the sight of the dancer and Herod feverishly looking on, without the preparation of the preceding action and dialogue, it necessarily loses greatly in effect. There is the first languorous tune; there is the sweeping melody for the strings; there is the brilliant instrumentation; but as a whole the dance is of little importance as a concert piece. It served yesterday to display the virtuoso ability of the orchestra. The skill and the exquisite taste of Messrs. Maquarre, flute, and Longy, oboe, were, as always, conspicuous, perhaps never more brilliantly displayed than in this composition and in Debussy's "Nocturnes."

Mr. Fiedler conducted a finely proportioned and delicately poetic performance of these Nocturnes, compositions of the rarest beauty. When they were played here late in 1908 under his direction, the singers were too prominent. It was as though the Nocturne "Sirens" were a cantata for female voices and orchestra. But these voice parts vie in reality only as instrumental parts, factors in an ensemble, now swelling, now sinking, their tones now hardly distinguishable in piano passages from those of certain wood-wind instruments. The members of the Musical Art Club contributed greatly by their charming tonal quality and aesthetic appreciation of the composer's purpose and wishes to a performance that will long be remembered.

The Nocturnes must be ranked with Debussy's most imaginative and daring achievements. Impressionistic, they are not formless and vague; harmonically audacious, they are not wantonly bizarre; each in its own way is wonderfully atmospheric, nor is it easy to say which one of the three is most alive with the beauty that voices impressions, souvenirs, dreams, not to be expressed in speech or in the printed page of an eloquent and subtle rhetorician. In these Nocturnes the composer reveals himself as master of melody, rhythm and color in the service of purely musical thought. And in comparison with them the music of many others, fine fellows in their way, seems prosaic, coarse, or tawdry.

Mr. Fiedler is heartily to be thanked for giving this admirable performance. There are not many conductors who, even with catholicity of taste, are able to enter into the spirit of each composer represented yesterday.

Mr. Ferir's full, rich, haunting tone and his consummate art were displayed in the Celtic song by Forsyth, an Englishman, and the Fantastic Dance by Mr. Strube of the orchestra. The soloist gave momentary importance to Forsyth's Song, which in itself is of slight significance, a pretty little piece for a promenade concert. Mr. Strube's Dance is truly fantastical; fantastical, ingenious and thoroughly musical.

The program of the concerts next week, the last of the present series, will be as follows: Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1; Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods," Prelude to "Lohengrin" and overture to "Tannhaeuser."

ADVERTISER, APRIL 27, 1912

MEMORIAL NUMBER IN SYMPHONY LI

REST OF PROGRAMME EVENLY BALANCED

Interesting Feature Was Salome's Dance From Strauss' "Salome," Played for First Time in Boston.

By Arthur Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" In Memoriam, April 14, 1912.

Wagner ..... "A Faust Overture."
Wagner ..... "A Siegfried Idyl."
(a) Cecil Forsyth .. "Chant Celtique" for Viola and Orchestra (First time at these concerts).
(b) Strube ..... "Fantastic Dance" for Viola and Orchestra.
Debussy ..... Three Nocturnes: "Clouds"; "Festivities"; "Sirens" (Chorus of Sirens Sung by the ladies of the Musical Art Club.)
Strauss ..... Salome's Dance from the Opera, "Salome" (First time in Boston).

Soloist: Emile Ferir.

The concert may be called one of the modern school, for the Beethoven movement had its special object. For such commemoration numbers there is no need of criticism, and Mr. Fiedler wisely kept his back turned to the little misguided applause that followed.

Wagner's Faust overture, likely nearly all his purely orchestral works, does not always show him at his best. Yet it is an impressive work, far more worthy than his noisy marches. In it he seemed akin to Berlioz, and a predecessor of Tchaikowsky. The opening theme of the overture itself, especially when it returns with full orchestra, is as furious as the great Russian's "Tempest," or the blasts of wind (and strings) in his stormy "Francesca." The beautiful side-theme of the Wagner number was given with full effect, and the strong contrast made Faust and Marguerite seem not unlike Senta and the Flying Dutchman. The work showed Wagner as master of the powerful style of expression, though scoring was sometimes a trifle turbid in comparison with the great scenes of the music-dramas.

The Siegfried Idyl was as charming as ever, but, for a work that dilates so much on one theme, it might have been started at a quicker tempo. Its shading was expressively brought out, but a little more force all through would not have been misplaced, as Symphony hall is larger than the Triebschen staircase that sufficed for the first performance.

Mr. Ferir's viola selections were both admirable. Cecil Forsyth is an English composer who studied with Stanford; and in the Celtic Dance he reflects his master's fondness for the Emerald Isle. A short antiphonal introduction combined clearness with dignity, and seemed not unworthy of the great race of bards. The work continued in this vein, with a contrasting section of more romantic character. If its scoring was somewhat light and simple, its material was excellent, and the solo instrument all the more prominent. There is room for English composers who do not follow the wilder styles of Holbrooke, Bantock or Delius.

Mr. Strube is one of Boston's "favorite sons" in music. If his dance was less persistently intense than the words of Wm. Lyman Johnson's poem, which inspired it, the work was none the less well-balanced and interesting. Back of the new and at times bizarre harmonies of Mr. Strube there is always a logical form-scheme, with much virility and expressive power. If one may use the phrase, he is an impressionist in harmony, but one whose drawing is always strong and correct. The dance itself was rhythmic, with a quieter middle section and a striking orchestral return. Mr. Strube was much applauded, and had to respond several times.

It is not often that a symphony soloist indulges in a "song and dance," but Mr. Ferir did so with the most artistic results. His tone was broad and full, and his intonation true in spite of the rather sultry air that puts stringed instruments out of tune. In the little solo cadenza near the end of the dance, Mr. Ferir gave some clean-cut double-stopping and arpeggio work.

Then came Debussy's three orchestral nocturnes—Clouds, Festivities, and The Sirens. The composer implied that they were not strictly nocturnes, but only so in a Pickwickian sense. However, the subjects seem to fit; we have noticed clouds by night, also festivals, and even those who claimed to be sirens. Besides, Debussy's harmonies often leave people in the dark.

There is beauty enough in these works, if that were all; a refinement of elfin delicacy, a mastery of color, a wealth of piquant details. The string phrases in "Clouds" are of an ethereal beauty. The festival, with swiftly repeated chords and bizarre runs, is interesting enough, while the approach of the procession is skilfully scored. The sirens (ladies who wear white and sing vocalises), made some remarks that seemed appropriate, even though confined to one vowel; while the orchestra echoed the rhythmic motion of the waves. Mr. Fiedler, too, read these pieces with excellent clearness and balance.

But the defects of Debussy are still there. His style is monotonous in its lightness, and tiresome in its abrupt harmonic changes. One can follow these, but it is hard work. We have a free impressionism not only in chords, but in progressions also. The latter are most attractive when most like our accustomed harmonic system. But there are so many disconnected chords that the orchestral works are largely harmonic fragments. One could end a Debussy Nocturne almost anywhere by merely tacking on a cadence. If people like this sort of musical stippling (as it has been well called), by all means let them enjoy it; but the Debussyites should not claim that this ear-tickling has abolished the classics, with their masterly balance of intellect and emotion.

The dance from "Salome" brought the concert to a wild conclusion. The strength of Strauss, after the too constant delicacy of Debussy, came like a breath of fresh air dispelling some narcotic perfume. But Strauss himself was very fragmentary here, and the much-censored Salome would need St. Vitus' dance in order to follow the orchestration properly. But there was greatness in spots, and the audience applauded.

[199]

TIGHT BINDING

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 26, 1912

MR. FIEDLER'S LEAVE-TAKING IN CAMBRIDGE

A Magnificent Performance of Strauss's "Heldenleben" Poorly Rewarded—The Consequences of a Child Violinist—Dr. Kunwald the New Conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra—Garnerings of Assorted Wisdom—The King "Honors" Mr. Hammerstein—Items as They Pass

MR. FIEDLER conducted for the last time in Cambridge yesterday at the final concert of the series that the Symphony Orchestra annually undertakes at Harvard, and if the leave-taking was less hearty and prolonged than there was reason to anticipate, the conductor has only himself to blame. For the first time within memory, he chose to open a concert of the Symphony Orchestra to a child performer, Irma Seydel, who in many private and a few public appearances here has proved an unusual aptitude for the violin, considerable accomplishment in the technique of the instrument and instinctive feeling for its tone. This particular child's merits or demerits have nothing to do with the case. As well Irma Seydel as any other, if the concerts of the foremost orchestra in America and of one of the foremost orchestras in the world are to be opened to child performers, under personal and social pressure and the accommodating mood of a conductor at the end of his term.

The Symphony Orchestra, the conductors who are charged with the control of the concerts, the audiences that hear and appraise them, are bound to maintain the standards that have made the band what it is, even though the partisans of this, that or the other player, cult or school count them austere and censorious. Once before, Mr. Fiedler has relaxed them under similar pressure in the closing weeks of his term. It was not a pleasant thing for those of us who cherish such standards to hear the Symphony Orchestra playing its way through one of Vieuxtemps's trumpery concertos in accompaniment of an apt, promising and pretty child in short skirts. She has her deserved and interesting place in this musical world of ours, but that place is not a concert of the Symphony Orchestra. As it was, circumstance retaliated promptly. The audiences at these Cambridge Concerts are proverbially good-natured, and they applauded the interesting child more heartily and for longer than they did the departing conductor whom for four years they have justly and sincerely admired. Flowers adorned his music-stand and he received the ribboned wreath of custom. He was warmly applauded when he took his place; but when the concert ended and he stood for the last time before his audience, its plaudits were brief and scattered.

All this was the more the pity since Mr. Fiedler was taking leave of this Cambridge public with one of the masterpieces of contemporary music, in which he himself is a most masterful, revealing and eloquent conductor—Strauss's tone-poem "A Hero-Life." Twice in his first season here and twice in the third, he has conducted in it in the regular concerts of the orchestra in Boston, and his version of the music stands among his highest achievements. Mr. Fiedler seizes the tone-poem boldly, energetically, sympathetically, and his grip upon it, his orchestra and his audience never relaxes. He reveals the music vividly, makes clear its close-knit symphonic structure, writes its dominant and characterizing melodies upon the listening imagination, keeps it unfolding its magnificent succession of tonal images as though they were rising out of itself. The hero strode last evening through the epic sonorities of the music that discloses and proclaims him. The love-music individualized the two voices, made their dialogue a penetrating musical speech, rose in sensuous and impassioned beauty to rapturous climax. And in the music with which the tone-poem ends—the music of the large thoughts, the mighty deeds, the high emotions of the hero, the music, too, that hymns his solemn and august passing—the conductor rose to its exaltation of image, feeling and voice, the exaltation that our sons and our sons' sons, knowing no petty controversies about Strauss, may call grandeur.

By like large understanding of the music and the composer, Mr. Fiedler laid no undue and freakish stress upon the passages, like the music of the adversaries and of the battle, that are dear to the ancients who would still like to believe Strauss a monster and not a master. Mr. Fiedler—and his orchestra with him—keep the "Heldenleben" a magnificent and unfolding music that rears out of itself the figure of Strauss's imagining and that becomes the voice of his great struggles and deeds of his dreams and passions. In all the tone-poems there is scarcely another that so unites musical and poetic design that more completely fuses tonal and emotional substance. With these last evening was fused the third element to the full life of the tone-poem, a conductor and an orchestra that understood, felt and imparted. If the audience would not crown Mr. Fiedler at the end of "A Hero-Life" his conducting of it did. H. T. P.

ADVERTISER,
MAY 4, 1912.

WARM FAREWELL TO CONDUCTOR FIEDLER

WEALTH OF GOOD WISHES FROM CONCERT AUDITORS

Splendid Tribute of Esteem Forced Upon Modest Leader of Boston's Famous Symphony Orchestra.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Weber. "Oberon" Overture.
Brahms. First Symphony, in C minor.
Wagner. Prelude and Love, Death from "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner. Siegfried's Funeral Music.
Wagner. Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Wagner. "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

Mr. Fiedler leaves Boston with a perfect halo of good wishes surrounding him. No conductor since Gericke has left such a pleasant savor. The audience yesterday afternoon applauded, and applauded, and applauded again. Mr. Fiedler made his orchestra rise, but the public soon made him understand that they were not applauding the orchestra, but were bidding him an affectionate farewell.

Possibly a critical review of the concert is not quite in place under such circumstances. Yet the programme ran so closely along the lines of some of the Nikisch, London orchestra concerts, that some comparisons are unavoidable. The "Oberon" overture was given with just the right theatrical spice. The magic horn call, the little march of the fairies, the strong crash that ends the introduction, the spirited chief theme, were all given with that flavor of the footlights which suits to Weber better than to any other composer of his time.

The Brahms symphony was the great feature of the concert. It was by no means less interesting than the performance which it had in Symphony hall a few weeks ago. A few technical flaws could be picked out, especially in the trombone passages which form the climax of the finale, but these did not mar the general effect which was overpowering.

The first and last movements were the great points of the interpretation. In the first movement there was all the vigor and virility which Nikisch gave to its reading and there was a distinctly better orchestra technique. Mr. Fiedler read this, and in fact the entire programme, without notes, and showed a surety and elasticity that was inspiring. The treatment of the pizzicato effects in the finale was especially free, in a sort of rubato, culminating with an accelerando rush that was not ineffective. The reading of the symphony deserved enthusiasm, but the applause was quite evidently a personal tribute to our beloved conductor. The audience even began rising, to do him honor, but he did not notice this, and left the platform, so that the standing devotees sat down again.

The programme was just a trifle too long, and one could have spared either the ecstasies of Isolde or the harmonic pipings of Lohengrin. But they were well played nevertheless. However, a climax came with the "Tannhaeuser" overture, which the eminent and fidgetty Bernard Shaw calls hackneyed. Here was clearly revealed the greatness of our orchestra by comparison with the celebrated London orchestra, which played this number a short time ago. The trombones and horns shaded beautifully in the religious chorus, and never became blatant, even in the fortissimo effects. The violins again proved their superiority over any body of strings that we have heard.

At the end of this the audience was determined to force its tribute of applause upon the modest conductor. It called him out twice. The second time he caused the orchestra to rise. But this was not what the excited public wanted. Again the conductor was recalled, and this time the whole house, galleries and floor, arose and remained standing and applauding. Mr. Fiedler evidently comprehended the tribute and began speaking his thanks. It was a charming speech which was evidently impromptu. Mr. Fiedler said, in substance: "In thanking you for your good will, I feel two things especially,—gratitude for your kindness, and sorrow at leaving. Your warm reception of my work is the greatest tribute of praise that any artist could ask, and I thank you from my heart. What has always been most pleasant here is the contact we have had, and by contact I mean the wireless operation between hearts and souls. This has helped to make the four years that I have spent here the happiest in my life. The orchestra, too, has worked hard under my direction, and responds to my ideas so well that I have felt the greatest joy in leading it. When I am gone I hope that you will keep a little corner for me in your memory; and don't forget me too soon!"

Thus ended a directorship that has been phenomenally and even unexpectedly successful. Almost every auditor has been pleased with the scope of the programmes given. There has been enough of novelty but no trace of partisanship in selecting the novelties. French, Italian, German, English, American, they have all had their turn.

Mr. Fiedler's own modest and genial ways have had an effect upon the public as well as upon those who knew him personally. And in his departure Mr. Fiedler bears with him the unanimous good wishes of all Boston. It is a great pity that America should lose him.

HERALD, MAY 2,

MAX FIEDLER'S FAREWELL

Max Fiedler will make his farewell appearances as conductor of the Symphony orchestra at the 24th rehearsal and concert tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. There will undoubtedly be an outpouring of his many friends among the Symphony subscribers to bid him farewell. He will leave Boston the middle of next week and will sail from New York on Saturday, May 11.

For his last program he has confined himself to well tried favorites. The works to be played are the "Oberon" overture of Weber, Brahms's C-minor symphony No. 1, the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture, by Wagner.

POST, APRIL 27, 1912

"SALOME" BY SYMPHONY

Dance From Opera and Tone Poem Presented.

BY OLIN DOWNES.

A symphony programme of unusual complexion was offered yesterday afternoon at the 23d public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. In memory of the recent terrible disaster on Midocean the funeral march from the "Eroica" symphony headed the list. Then there was the superbly dramatic "Faust" overture of Wagner and the "Siegfried Idyll." Emil Ferir, the excellent first viola of the orchestra and soloist on this occasion, played a new piece for viola and orchestra, a "chant Celtique" by Cecil Forsyth, a contemporaneous Englishman, and Gustave Strube's ingenious "Fantastic Dance" for the same instruments. The piece by Forsyth is smug, respectable, harmless. Debussy's Nocturnes, music for the most part of ineffable beauty and fantasy, in which members of the Musical Art Club assisted the orchestra, preceded the "Dance of Salome" from Strauss' opera, the only music from this work which censored Boston will hear, probably, for some years to come.

This dance is a superb symphonic poem in itself. It is the climax of the opera, accentuating its dramatic culmination, preceding the decapitation of the prophet and the marvellous lyrical rhapsody of the princess of Judea. There are the measures of quick oriental preluding, then the strange and capricious passages that flame up, here and there, in sudden and violent impulses of savage passion; then the haunting sensuous waltz and its emotional development, with the music of Salome and of her frenetic desire; finally, the magnificent contrapuntal development of all these musical and dramatic motives with a sweeping power, the longing cry of a clarinet, and the mad conclusion.

May Be Made Clearer

Both this piece and the Nocturnes of Debussy, carefully and sympathetically treated, will probably be played with more authority, elasticity and abandon this evening, and one performance of the dance does not serve to make clear all of its extraordinary details, or to establish conclusively the tempi which would be most advantageous to the piece.

It is possible that the final passage, which in technical terms corresponds somewhat to the working-out section of a symphonic piece, could be made clearer. The music goes very rapidly and there are many important inner voices which it was not always easy to follow on an initial hearing. This much, however, may be said: That Strauss has written music which shows to equal advantage, whether considered as the accompaniment of a spectacle on the stage or as a splendid symphonic poem, complete in itself, and music which is gorgeous, passionate, dramatic to the extreme, and the more picturesque by reason of its oriental coloring. Listening to these motives, so amazingly articulate, so masterfully contrasted and re-enforced, it is possible to follow by this means alone the psychology of its characters, of swooning passion, sinister menace or triumphant desire.

Nocturnes Exquisite

Far more exquisite, far more beautiful, if you will, are the nocturnes of Debussy, though within a limited scope which would never have satisfied the exorbitant consciousness of Richard Strauss. After all, the grandest music on the programme was the Beethoven funeral march, and the music most expressive and most convincing to modern ears was Wagner's Faust overture.

Posterity should never forgive this composer for having omitted a Faust symphony or symphonic poem from the list of his achievements. For when Wagner died the hope of a true Faust in music, the restless and intrepid soul foreshadowed in the famous poem, died with him. The hall was packed. The audience was cordial in its applause and Mr. Ferir was enthusiastically recalled for his thrice admirable performance.

JOURNAL, APRIL 27,

SYMPHONY SEASON CLOSES NEXT WEEK

Pop Concerts Will Begin May 6—Nikisch to Appear Here Today.

Next week brings the final Symphony concerts of the season and the farewell appearances here of Max Fiedler, who for four years has been at the head of the orchestra. For his last concert Mr. Fiedler will devote himself entirely to well-tried favorites. The program will comprise the "Oberon" overture of Weber, Brahms's C minor Symphony, No. 1, and four Wagnerian selections, the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

MAY 4, 1912.

MY HAPPIEST YEARS, DECLARES FIEDLER

Conductor's Tribute to the Symphony and Boston on Bidding Farewell.

"Artistically, these last four years have been the happiest of my life," said Max Fiedler in his good-by to the Symphony matinee audience yesterday, and the hallful of people, all standing up to pay their respects to the most popular leader all around the Symphony Orchestra has had so far, applauded in the friendliest fashion.

There will be another farewell celebration tonight, after the last concert of the season, but yesterday's enthusiasm can hardly be surpassed. In the first place, there was not a vacant seat in the big hall and all but a few waited until the concert was over to take part in the expected tribute to the noted German musician, whose musical taste is as broad as the ocean and whose English, by the way, is as neat and fluent as a Bach fugue.

The applause had lasted fully five minutes before Mr. Fiedler began to speak. He thanked the audience for its support and sympathy—above all, for its attitude which, as he expressed it, informed him and the orchestra as if by wireless that the patrons of the concert were in accord with the spirit of the performance. He thanked the orchestra—the best he had ever worked with, he said—for its patience amid all the hard labors of the season and its willing response to his leadership. He would never forget these happy years, and he hoped the people of Boston would keep a little corner in their heart for him.

The graceful, heartfelt speech renewed the applause, and many pressed forward to the edge of the platform to shake the departing conductor's hand.

It was an afternoon of memorable pleasures and compliments. Weber's Overture to "Oberon," the first Brahms Symphony, and four Wagner numbers, the Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan," the Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods," the "Lohengrin" Prelude and the "Tannhaeuser" Overture comprised the program; and, barring a few signs of nervousness, all were beautifully performed. The Brahms Symphony and the "Tannhaeuser" Overture, special favorites of Mr. Fiedler, had a place on his very first program as well as his last.

Mr. Fiedler has no plans for next season. He will return to Germany in a few days. Among the retiring members of the orchestra are Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist; Mr. Sautet, the oboist, and two of the original members, Paul Fox, the second flute player, and Carl Schumann, one of the horn players.

GLOB APRIL 27, 191

"SALOME" DANCE AT LAST IN BOSTON

Brilliant Performance by Fiedler and Orchestra.

Mr Ferir, Violist, Shows Admirable Qualities of His Art.

Salome's dance from Strauss' opera of the name was played yesterday afternoon at the Symphony rehearsal for the first time in Boston. The audience apparently was perplexed by the intensely dramatic character of the music, the precipitate and violent abruptness of the final and frenetic climaxes, and gave the number but scant applause. In no afternoon concert of recent memory has there been less.

All of which has no bearing whatsoever upon the interest-begetting power of this music. It only calls to mind how unfair to the composer of a lyric drama it is, to extract a portion of his work and spread it to view in the concert room, when the concomitant aids of action and all the illusive means of the stage constitute its true environment. It will be to the lasting misfortune and disgrace of this city that a hearing of the music in such a manner was thwarted when Mr Hammerstein was willing to produce the opera in Boston. It is now an oft told tale of how the righteous were then appeased with the proffered though uneffected substitution of "Samson and Delilah," wherein the chosen of Israel actually falls a victim to pagan wiles. Such is the reasonableness of a censorship by telephone.

Mr Fiedler is to be thanked for placing this excerpt upon his program and for the brilliant performance which he and the orchestra gave of it, even though when heard in concert it must suggest its incompleteness and incongruity without the context.

Here Strauss is again the masterful technician of the complicated apparatus of the modern orchestra, the dazzling colorest, the man of brilliant and versatile imagination. With what economy of musical material and orchestral resource he begins, and yet with what dramatizing force he interprets. Here are the languors of pagan eroticism, yet with a simplicity, a spontaneity, as though the luxurious sensuousness of Herod's court were the natural environment of young women whose abandonment became them as innocence.

Strauss has not always characterized in this opera as graphically nor written as confidently of his appeal. He [illegible] study and admiration in the [illegible]

[illegible] of the violas, afforded rare enjoyment in the two numbers by Cecil Forsyth and Mr Strube. The Chant Celtique by the former—a member of the younger British school—proved a pleasing piece of sustained writing, suggestive in its melodic form and continent harmonic background of folk song material. It gave Mr Ferir opportunity to display the marked beauty of his tone, a tone like dull or sombre gold, and the sincerity and breadth of his style.

In Mr Strube's number, heard before at these concerts, the orchestra divides interest with the solo instrument by its weird and sinister tone painting of the dissonant and magic dance, as set forth in William Lyman Johnson's flaming verses. Mr Strube has gained effects in the upper register of the viola which tends naturally to stridency. Mr Ferir gave dramatic and pictorial significance to the solo part here, and was particularly telling in the songful episods of [illegible] protest in the lines.

The delicate and tenuous tone tracery of Debussy's Nocturnes ("Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens") was again welcome. Unfortunately there was a moment of insecure intonation in the wind at the close of the first. The movement had been one of nebulous, vaporous beauty. Where is the choir of strings that could make it as imaginative? The brighter and more fantastic "Festivals" to a degree foreshadows "Iberia" in its rhythmic mosaic and piquant coloring. The part for women's voices in the "Sirens" were sung by members of the Musical Art Club with purity of tone, good balance and attack. The use of voices here in mere vocalization is exacting in color and in variety of nuance.

Wagner's "Faust" overture, and "Siegfried" Idyl, and the funeral march from the "Eroica" symphony constituted the first part. It was unfortunate that the untimely and forward applause of some marred the impressive effect of the last of these, a number performed in memory of the recent maritime disaster.

The program for the next and last pair of concerts of the season will be as follows: Weber, "Oberon" overture; Brahms, symphony No. 1; Wagner, prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde"; funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods"; prelude to "Lohengrin" overture to "Tannhauser."

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 30, 1912

MR. SCHROEDER RETIRES

The Veteran First 'Cellist of the Symphony Orchestra to Leave It at the End of the Season—His Twenty Years' Work in Boston

With the concerts of this week, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, long the first 'cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, is retiring definitely from his place in the band. In two months he will be fifty-seven years old; his health is not strong; and he has found the strain of a hundred and twenty concerts a year, much journeying, constant rehearsals and occasional appearances as a soloist more than he can well endure. He is leaving the orchestra accordingly, and he will give his time henceforth to playing in concert as a virtuoso and to teaching.

Mr. Schroeder came from the Gewandhaus in Leipsic to be the first 'cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, when Mr. Gericke re-organized its string choir in the fall of 1891. Mr. Kneisel joined the orchestra at the same time and together—with Mr. Higginson's support—they founded the Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Schroeder continued in the orchestra for twelve seasons, became one of its distinguished members, whom the public individualized, was a soloist often and generally enjoyed the position of a violoncellist of the first orchestral rank. Meanwhile the Kneisel Quartet steadily increased the number of its concerts, and in the spring of 1903 Mr. Schroeder left the orchestra to give his whole time and work to it. Four years later, in the spring of 1907, personal differences parted him and Mr. Kneisel; he left the quartet, gave farewell concerts in Boston and in other cities at which the public was most cordial to him, and departed to Germany to settle at Frankfort.

There Mr. Schroeder found to his chagrin that Germany had forgotten him as a violoncellist. His life there proved uncongenial, and he returned to Boston in the summer of 1908. He became the violoncellist of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet and generally led the life of a virtuoso. In the autumn of 1910 he rejoined the Symphony Orchestra and for three seasons he has shared the first 'cellist's desk with Mr. Warnke and played, besides, annually as soloist. The public of the concerts knows well his ruddy face, his gray locks and his gentle and absorbed air. Whenever he has appeared as a soloist it has received him warmly. Now it will miss him as a familiar figure, week by week, on the stage of Symphony Hall.

[200]

TIGHT BINDING

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 26, 1912

MR. FIEDLER'S LEAVE-TAKING IN CAMBRIDGE

A Magnificent Performance of Strauss's "Heldenleben" Poorly Rewarded—The Consequences of a Child Violinist—Dr. Kunwald the New Conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra—Garnerings of Assorted Wisdom—The King "Honors" Mr. Hammerstein—Items as They Pass

MR. FIEDLER conducted for the last time in Cambridge yesterday at the final concert of the series that the Symphony Orchestra annually undertakes at Harvard, and if the leave-taking was less hearty and prolonged than there was reason to anticipate, the conductor has only himself to blame. For the first time within memory, he chose to open a concert of the Symphony Orchestra to a child performer, Irma Seydel, who in many private and a few public appearances here has proved an unusual aptitude for the violin, considerable accomplishment in the technique of the instrument and instinctive feeling for its tone. This particular child's merits or demerits have nothing to do with the case. As well Irma Seydel as any other, if the concerts of the foremost orchestra in America and of one of the foremost orchestras in the world are to be opened to child performers, under personal and social pressure and the accommodating mood of a conductor at the end of his term.

The Symphony Orchestra, the conductors who are charged with the control of the concerts, the audiences that hear and appraise them, are bound to maintain the standards that have made the band what it is, even though the partisans of this, that or the other player, cult or school count them austere and censorious. Once before, Mr. Fiedler has relaxed them under similar pressure in the closing weeks of his term. It was not a pleasant thing for those of us who cherish such standards to hear the Symphony Orchestra playing its way through one of Vieuxtemps's trumpery concertos in accompaniment of an apt, promising and pretty child in short skirts. She has her deserved and interesting place in this musical world of ours, but that place is not a concert of the Symphony Orchestra. As it was, circumstance retaliated promptly. The audiences at these Cambridge Concerts are proverbially good-natured, and they applauded the interesting child more heartily and for longer than they did the departing conductor whom for four years they have justly and sincerely admired. Flowers adorned his music-stand and he received the ribboned wreath of custom. He was warmly applauded when he took his place; but when the concert ended and he stood for the last time before his audience, its plaudits were brief and scattered.

All this was the more the pity since Mr. Fiedler was taking leave of this Cambridge public with one of the masterpieces of contemporary music, in which he himself is a most masterful, revealing and eloquent conductor—Strauss's tone-poem "A Hero-Life." Twice in his first season here and twice in the third, he has conducted in it in the regular concerts of the orchestra in Boston, and his version of the music stands among his highest achievements. Mr. Fiedler seizes the tone-poem boldly, energetically, sympathetically, and his grip upon it, his orchestra and his audience never relaxes. He reveals the music vividly, makes clear its close-knit symphonic structure, writes its dominant and characterizing melodies upon the listening imagination, keeps it unfolding its magnificent succession of tonal images as though they were rising out of itself. The hero strode last evening through the epic sonorities of the music that discloses and proclaims him. The love-music individualized the two voices, made their dialogue a penetrating musical speech, rose in sensuous and impassioned beauty to rapturous climax. And in the music with which the tone-poem ends—the music of the large thoughts, the mighty deeds, the high emotions of the hero, the music, too, that hymns his solemn and august passing—the conductor rose to its exaltation of image, feeling and voice, the exaltation that our sons and our sons' sons, knowing no petty controversies about Strauss, may call grandeur.

By like large understanding of the music and the composer, Mr. Fiedler laid no undue and freakish stress upon the passages, like the music of the adversaries and of the battle, that are dear to the ancients who would still like to believe Strauss a monster and not a master. Mr. Fiedler—and his orchestra with him—keep the "Heldenleben" a magnificent and unfolding music that rears out of itself the figure of Strauss's imagining and that becomes the voice of his great struggles and deeds of his dreams and passions. In all the tone-poems there is scarcely another that so unites musical and poetic design that more completely fuses tonal and emotional substance. With these last evening was fused the third element to the full life of the tone-poem, a conductor and an orchestra that understood, felt and imparted. If the audience would not crown Mr. Fiedler at the end of "A Hero-Life" his conducting of it did.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER.
MAY 4, 1912.

WARM FAREWELL TO CONDUCTOR FIEDLER

WEALTH OF GOOD WISHES FROM CONCERT AUDITORS

Splendid Tribute of Esteem Forced Upon Modest Leader of Boston's Famous Symphony Orchestra.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Weber. "Oberon" Overture.
Brahms. First Symphony, in C minor.
Wagner. Prelude and Love, Death from "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner. Siegfried's Funeral Music.
Wagner. Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Wagner. "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

Mr. Fiedler leaves Boston with a perfect halo of good wishes surrounding him. No conductor since Gericke has left such a pleasant savor. The audience yesterday afternoon applauded, and applauded, and applauded again. Mr. Fiedler made his orchestra rise, but the public soon made him understand that they were not applauding the orchestra, but were bidding him an affectionate farewell.

Possibly a critical review of the concert is not quite in place under such circumstances. Yet the programme ran so closely along the lines of some of the Nikisch, London orchestra concerts, that some comparisons are unavoidable. The "Oberon" overture was given with just the right theatrical spice. The magic horn call, the little march of the fairies, the strong crash that ends the introduction, the spirited chief theme, were all given with that flavor of the footlights which suits to Weber better than to any other composer of his time.

The Brahms symphony was the great feature of the concert. It was by no means less interesting than the performance which it had in Symphony hall a few weeks ago. A few technical flaws could be picked out, especially in the trombone passages which form the climax of the finale, but these did not mar the general effect which was overpowering.

The first and last movements were the great points of the interpretation. In the first movement there was all the vigor and virility which Nikisch gave to its reading and there was a distinctly better orchestra technique. Mr. Fiedler read this, and in fact the entire programme, without notes, and showed a surety and elasticity that was inspiring. The treatment of the pizzicato effects in the finale was especially free, in a sort of rubato, culminating with an accelerando rush that was not ineffective. The reading of the symphony deserved enthusiasm, but the applause was quite evidently a personal tribute to our beloved conductor. The audience even began rising, to do him honor, but he did not notice this, and left the platform, so that the standing devotees sat down again.

The programme was just a trifle too long, and one could have spared either the ecstasies of Isolde or the harmonic pipings of Lohengrin. But they were well played nevertheless. However, a climax came with the "Tannhaeuser" overture, which the eminent and fidgetty Bernard Shaw calls hackneyed. Here was clearly revealed the greatness of our orchestra by comparison with the celebrated London orchestra, which played this number a short time ago. The trombones and horns shaded beautifully in the religious chorus, and never became blatant, even in the fortissimo effects. The violins again proved their superiority over any body of strings that we have heard.

At the end of this the audience was determined to force its tribute of applause upon the modest conductor. It called him out twice. The second time he caused the orchestra to rise. But this was not what the excited public wanted. Again the conductor was recalled, and this time the whole house, galleries and floor, arose and remained standing and applauding. Mr. Fiedler evidently comprehended the tribute and began speaking his thanks. It was a charming speech which was evidently impromptu. Mr. Fiedler said, in substance: "In thanking you for your good will, I feel two things especially,—gratitude for your kindness, and sorrow at leaving. Your warm reception of my work is the greatest tribute of praise that any artist could ask, and I thank you from my heart. What has always been most pleasant here is the contact we have had, and by contact I mean the wireless operation between hearts and souls. This has helped to make the four years that I have spent here the happiest in my life. The orchestra, too, has worked hard under my direction, and responds to my ideas so well that I have felt the greatest joy in leading it. When I am gone I hope that you will keep a little corner for me in your memory; and don't forget me too soon!"

Thus ended a directorship that has been phenomenally and even unexpectedly successful. Almost every auditor has been pleased with the scope of the programs given. There has been enough of novelty but no trace of partizanship in selecting the novelties. French, Italian, German, English, American, they have all had their turn.

Mr. Fiedler's own modest and genial ways have had an effect upon the public as well as upon those who knew him personally. And in his departure Mr. Fiedler bears with him the unanimous good wishes of all Boston. It is a great pity that America should lose him.

HERALD, MAY 2,

MAX FIEDLER'S FAREWELL

Max Fiedler will make his farewell appearances as conductor of the Symphony orchestra at the 24th rehearsal and concert tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. There will undoubtedly be an outpouring of his many friends among the Symphony subscribers to bid him farewell. He will leave Boston the middle of next week and will sail from New York on Saturday, May 11.

For his last program he has confined himself to well tried favorites. The works to be played are the "Oberon" overture of Weber, Brahms's C-minor Symphony No. 1, the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture, by Wagner.

POST,
APRIL 27, 1912

"SALOME" BY SYMPHONY

Dance From Opera and Tone Poem Presented

BY OLIN DOWNES

A symphony programme of unusual complexion was offered yesterday afternoon at the 23d public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. In memory of the recent terrible disaster on midocean the funeral march from the "Eroica" symphony headed the list. Then there was the superbly dramatic "Faust" overture of Wagner and the "Siegfried Idyll." Emil Ferir, the excellent first viola of the orchestra and soloist on this occasion, played a new piece for viola and orchestra, a "chant Celtique" by Cecil Forsyth, a contemporaneous Englishman, and Gustave Strube's ingenious "Fantastic Dance" for the same instruments. The piece by Forsyth is smug, respectable, harmless. Debussy's Nocturnes, music for the most part of ineffable beauty and fantasy, in which members of the Musical Art Club assisted the orchestra, preceded the "Dance of Salome" from Strauss' opera, the only music from this work which censored Boston will hear, probably, for some years to come.

This dance is a superb symphonic poem in itself. It is the climax of the opera, accentuating its dramatic culmination, preceding the decapitation of the prophet and the marvellous lyrical rhapsody of the princess of Judea. There are the measures of quick oriental preluding, then the strange and capricious passages that flame up, here and there, in sudden and violent impulses of savage passion; then the haunting sensuous waltz and its emotional development, with the music of Salome and of her frenetic desire; finally, the magnificent contrapuntal development of all these musical and dramatic motives with a sweeping power, the longing cry of a clarinet, and the mad conclusion.

May Be Made Clearer

Both this piece and the Nocturnes of Debussy, carefully and sympathetically treated, will probably be played with more authority, elasticity and abandon this evening, and one performance of the dance does not serve to make clear all of its extraordinary details, or to establish conclusively the tempi which would be most advantageous to the piece.

It is possible that the final passage, which in technical terms corresponds somewhat to the working-out section of a symphonic piece, could be made clearer. The music goes very rapidly and there are many important inner voices which it was not always easy to follow on an initial hearing. This much, however, may be said: That Strauss has written music which shows to equal advantage, whether considered as the accompaniment of a spectacle on the stage or as a splendid symphonic poem, complete in itself, and music which is gorgeous, passionate, dramatic to the extreme, and the more picturesque by reason of its oriental coloring. Listening to these motives, so amazingly articulate, so masterfully contrasted and re-enforced, it is possible to follow by this means alone the psychology of its [illegible] of swooning passion, sinister menace or triumphant desire.

Nocturnes Exquisite

Far more exquisite, far more beautiful, if you will, are the nocturnes of Debussy, though within a limited scope which would never have satisfied the exorbitant consciousness of Richard Strauss. After all, the grandest music on the programme was the Beethoven funeral march, and the music most expressive and most convincing to modern ears was Wagner's Faust overture.

Posterity should never forgive this composer for having omitted a Faust symphony or symphonic poem from the list of his achievements. For when Wagner died the hope of a true Faust in music, the restless and intrepid soul foreshadowed in the famous poem, died with him. The hall was packed. The audience was cordial in its applause and Mr. Ferir was enthusiastically recalled for his thrice admirable performances.

JOURNAL, APRIL 27,

SYMPHONY SEASON CLOSES NEXT WEEK

Pop Concerts Will Begin May 6—Nikisch to Appear Here Today.

Next week brings the final Symphony concerts of the season and the farewell appearances here of Max Fiedler, who for four years has been at the head of the orchestra. For his last concert Mr. Fiedler will devote himself entirely to well-tried favorites. The program will comprise the "Oberon" overture of Weber, Brahms's C minor Symphony, No. 1, and four Wagnerian selections, the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods," the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

JOU[illegible] MAY 4, 1912.

MY HAPPIEST YEARS, DECLARES FIEDLER

Conductor's Tribute to the Symphony and Boston on Bidding Farewell.

"Artistically, these last four years have been the happiest of my life," said Max Fiedler in his good-by to the Symphony matinee audience yesterday, and the hallful of people, all standing up to pay their respects to the most popular leader all around the Symphony Orchestra has had so far, applauded in the friendliest fashion.

There will be another farewell celebration tonight, after the last concert of the season, but yesterday's enthusiasm can hardly be surpassed. In the first place, there was not a vacant seat in the big hall and all but a few waited until the concert was over to take part in the expected tribute to the noted German musician, whose musical taste is as broad as the ocean and whose English, by the way, is as neat and fluent as a Bach fugue.

The applause had lasted fully five minutes before Mr. Fiedler began to speak. He thanked the audience for its support and sympathy—above all, for its attitude which, as he expressed it, informed him and the orchestra as if by wireless that the patrons of the concert were in accord with the spirit of the performance. He thanked the orchestra—the best he had ever worked with, he said—for its patience amid all the hard labors of the season and its willing response to his leadership. He would never forget these happy years, and he hoped the people of Boston would keep a little corner in their heart for him.

The graceful, heartfelt speech renewed the applause, and many pressed forward to the edge of the platform to shake the departing conductor's hand.

It was an afternoon of memorable pleasures and compliments. Weber's Overture to "Oberon," the first Brahms Symphony, and four Wagner numbers, the Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan," the Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods," the "Lohengrin" Prelude and the "Tannhaeuser" Overture comprised the program; and, barring a few signs of nervousness, all were beautifully performed. The Brahms Symphony and the "Tannhaeuser" Overture, special favorites of Mr. Fiedler, had a place on his very first program as well as his last.

Mr. Fiedler has no plans for next season. He will return to Germany in a few days. Among the retiring members of the orchestra are Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist; Mr. Sautet, the oboist, and two of the original members, Paul Fox, the second flute player, and Carl Schumann, one of the horn players.

GLOB[illegible] APRIL 27, 191

"SALOME" DANCE AT LAST IN BOSTON

Brilliant Performance by Fiedler and Orchestra.

Mr Ferir, Violist, Shows Admirable Qualities of His Art.

Salome's dance from Strauss' opera of the name was played yesterday afternoon at the Symphony rehearsal for the first time in Boston. The audience apparently was perplexed by the intensely dramatic character of the music, the precipitate and violent abruptness of the final and frenetic climaxes, and gave the number but scant applause. In no afternoon concert of recent memory has there been less.

All of which has no bearing whatsoever upon the interest-begetting power of this music. It only calls to mind how unfair to the composer of a lyric drama it is, to extract a portion of his work and spread it to view in the concert room, when the concomitant aids of action and all the illusive means of the stage constitute its true environment. It will be to the lasting misfortune and disgrace of this city that a hearing of the music in such a manner was thwarted when Mr Hammerstein was willing to produce the opera in Boston. It is now an oft told tale of how the righteous were then appeased with the proffered though uneffected substitution of "Samson and Delilah," wherein the chosen of Israel actually falls a victim to pagan wiles. Such is the reasonableness of a censorship by telephone.

Mr Fiedler is to be thanked for placing this excerpt upon his program and for the brilliant performance which he and the orchestra gave of it, even though when heard in concert it must suggest its incompleteness and incongruity without the context.

Here Strauss is again the masterful technician of the complicated apparatus of the modern orchestra, the dazzling colorest, the man of brilliant and versatile imagination. With what economy of musical material and orchestral resource he begins, and yet with what dramatizing force he interprets. Here are the languors of pagan eroticism, yet with a simplicity, a spontaneity, as though the luxurious sensuousness of Herod's court were the natural environment of young women whose abandonment became them as innocence.

Strauss has not always characterized in this opera as graphically nor written as confidently of his appeal. He invites study and admiration in the place of de[illegible] elopment. The differentiation in the music when Salome succeeds the dancers; the restraint in intensifying the nervous stimuli until the hearer feels suspense, but the ear is not jaded, not dulled under an avalanche of sound. There is emotional power in the cumulative ascent and quickening of pace, at first suppressed then whipped into the delirium and erotic frenzy of the final measures, a hight and temperature too excessive to keep, therefore the gigantic leaps to silence, as sharp in contrast as a blinding flash of light out of the darkness, only to be succeeded by another sweeping climax.

Such music is too breath-taking to gain immediate appreciation. The composer does not unloose all his bolts until the last few seconds, and their force is spent like the lightning. Mr Fiedler conducted with keen dramatic sense, and the performance was worthy the individual virtuosity of this superb orchestra.

Emile Ferir, the eminent principal of the violas, afforded rare enjoyment in the two numbers by Cecil Forsyth and Mr Strube. The Chant Celtique by the former—a member of the younger British school—proved a pleasing piece of sustained writing, suggestive in its melodic form and continent harmonic background of folk song material. It gave Mr Ferir opportunity to display the marked beauty of his tone, a tone like dull or sombre gold, and the sincerity and breadth of his style.

In Mr Strube's number, heard before at these concerts, the orchestra divides interest with the solo instrument by its weird and sinister tone painting of the dissonant and magic dance, as set forth in William Lyman Johnson's flaming verses. Mr Strube has gained effects in the upper register of the viola which tends naturally to stridency. Mr Ferir gave dramatic and pictorial significance to the solo part here, and was particularly telling in the songful episode of wearied protest in the lines.

The delicate and tenuous tone tracery of Debussy's Nocturnes ("Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens") was again welcome. Unfortunately there was a moment of insecure intonation in the wind at the close of the first. The movement had been one of nebulous, vaporous beauty. Where is the choir of strings that could make it as imaginative? The brighter and more fantastic "Festivals" to a degree foreshadows "Iberia" in its rhythmic mosaic and piquant coloring. The part for women's voices in the "Sirens" were sung by members of the Musical Art Club with purity of tone, good balance and attack. The use of voices here in mere vocalization is exacting in color and in variety of nuance.

Wagner's "Faust" overture, and "Siegfried" Idyl, and the funeral march from the "Eroica" symphony constituted the first part. It was unfortunate that the untimely and forward applause of some marred the impressive effect of the last of these, a number performed in memory of the recent maritime disaster.

The program for the next and last pair of concerts of the season will be as follows: Weber, "Oberon" overture; Brahms's symphony No. 1; Wagner, prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde"; funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods"; prelude to "Lohengrin"; overture to "Tannhauser."

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 30, 1912

MR. SCHROEDER RETIRES

The Veteran First 'Cellist of the Symphony Orchestra to Leave It at the End of the Season—His Twenty Years' Work in Boston

With the concerts of this week, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, long the first 'cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, is retiring definitely from his place in the band. In two months he will be fifty-seven years old; his health is not strong; and he has found the strain of a hundred and twenty concerts a year, much journeying, constant rehearsals and occasional appearances as a soloist more than he can well endure. He is leaving the orchestra accordingly, and he will give his time henceforth to playing in concert as a virtuoso and to teaching.

Mr. Schroeder came from the Gewandhaus in Leipsic to be the first 'cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, when Mr. Gericke reorganized its string choir in the fall of 1891. Mr. Kneisel joined the orchestra at the same time and together—with Mr. Higginson's support—they founded the Kneisel Quartet. Mr. Schroeder continued in the orchestra for twelve seasons, became one of its distinguished members, whom the public individualized, was a soloist often and generally enjoyed the position of a violoncellist of the first orchestral rank. Meanwhile the Kneisel Quartet steadily increased the number of its concerts, and in the spring of 1903 Mr. Schroeder left the orchestra to give his whole time and work to it. Four years later, in the spring of 1907, personal differences parted him and Mr. Kneisel; he left the quartet, gave farewell concerts in Boston and in other cities, at which the public was most cordial to him, and departed to Germany to settle in Frankfort.

There Mr. Schroeder found to his chagrin that Germany had forgotten him as a violoncellist. His life there proved uncongenial, and he returned to Boston in the summer of 1908. He became the violoncellist of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet and generally led the life of a virtuoso. In the autumn of 1910 he rejoined the Symphony Orchestra and for three seasons he has shared the first 'cellist's desk with Mr. Warnke and played, besides, annually as soloist. The public of the concerts knows well his ruddy face, his gray locks and his gentle and absorbed air. Whenever he has appeared as a soloist it has received him warmly. Now it will miss him as a familiar figure, week by week, on the stage of Symphony Hall.

L 200

JOURNAL— MAY 6, 1912.

FIEDLER'S FAREWELL

Max Fiedler's conductorship, which ended with Saturday night's concert, leaves the Symphony Orchestra still pre-eminent in the new world and more popular than ever, not only here in Boston, but in the cities visited by the orchestra from time to time. It has served its purpose admirably—that of upholding the high standards long ago established by the orchestra and providing the people with much intellectual pleasure and profit. It might also be added, in justice to the management, that Mr. Fiedler himself has profited by opportunities for development the like of which can probably not be found anywhere else in the musical world.

All of which reflects incalculable credit upon the spirit in which the orchestra has been supported and directed since its very foundation. We are sure that Mr. Fiedler has been as happy in his four years' stay here as the public has been with his efforts to maintain the high prestige which puts the orchestra beyond fear of comparison with other like organizations at home or abroad.

"THE POPS"

Season of Nine-teen-Hundred ~~and~~ Twelve.

PRESS NOTICES.

POP CONCERTS TO BEGIN ON MONDAY

The 27th season of the Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall next Monday evening, May 6, and for eight weeks the concerts will be given every evening except Sundays. The past several seasons have been a constant and gratifying growth in the patronage given to these concerts until last year it was seldom indeed during the nine weeks that the concerts lasted that the house was not completely filled. Both conductors of last year have been engaged for this season—Mr. Strube for the first four weeks and Mr. Andre Maquarre for the last four. Mr. Strube in the many years that he has conducted the Pop concerts has built up for himself a large and friendly public, while Mr. Maquarre in the three years that he has been a Pop conductor has come to be one of the best liked musician that ever held that post. Having men of opposite temperaments and taste like Mr. Strube and Mr. Maquarre gives decided diversity and variety to the season, for Mr. Maquarre, being a Frenchman, leans largely toward the lighter pieces of French composers and Mr. Strube, being a German, depends largely upon composers of his nationality.

At the same time novelties are not allowed to push out the old and tried favorites. In the programmes of the coming season will be heard the best tunes and selections from the musical comedies that have come out in the past year. Now and then will be given a "Special Night," devoted largely to Wagner or Tschaikowsky, or German music, or French music or Italian music, but the conductors are careful never to make programmes too serious and an enticing Vienna waltz or a jolly polka are always to be played in the course of an evening.

The concert will last, as usual, from 8 to 11. On each programme will be 12 numbers. Both conductors are liberal in the matter of encores and this year, as last, the organ will be used several times a week. John P. Marshall will be the organist.

During the first half of the season the concert-master will be Jacques Hoffmann, and during the second half William Krafft. The programme for Monday evening, the opening night, is as follows:

March, "The Queene of Sheba"....Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"....Komzak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite "Sylvia".....Delibes
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Serenade.....Strube
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"....Saint-Saens
Introduction to Act III., from "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf Ferrari
Overture, "Il Guarany".....Gomez
Waltz, "Roses fromthe South"..Straus
Selection, "The Pink Lady".....Carey
March, "Hans Richter".....Schram

Traveler
April 27, 1912

THE POP CONCERTS.

The sale of seats for the first week of the Pop concerts will open at Symphony Hall Monday morning. No special nights as yet have been arranged for the first week, but Amherst College will have a night of its own in the early part of the season, and Tufts College will have its biennial night Tuesday evening, May 21. This year the Pops will last but eight weeks, instead of the usual nine, beginning on Monday evening, May 6, and ending Saturday evening, June 29. Gustav Strube will be the conductor during the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre during the last four. Both of these gentlemen have a number of novelties in the way of light music which will be played, but none of the old favorites will be neglected. The programme of the opening night will give the patrons an opportunity to hear for the first time a piece from the most successful of contemporary operas—Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna."

Journal
April 27, 1912

Pop Concerts

The sale of seats for the first week of the Pop concerts will open at Symphony Hall Monday morning. Tufts College will have its biennial night on Tuesday, May 21. This year the Pops will last but eight weeks, beginning on Monday evening, May 6. Gustav Strube will be the conductor during the first four weeks. The season promises to be the most successful on record. The program of the opening night will give the patrons an opportunity to hear for the first time a piece from the most successful of contemporary operas—Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna." This is the introduction to the third act.

Post
April 28, 1912

THE POP CONCERTS

The sale of seats for the first week of the Pop concerts will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning. No special nights as yet have been arranged for the first week, but Amherst College will have a night of its own in the early part of the season and Tufts College will have its biennial night on Tuesday evening, May 21. This year the Pops will last but eight weeks instead of the usual nine, beginning on Monday evening, May 6, and ending Saturday evening, June 29. Gustav Strube will be the conductor during the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre during the last four. Both of these gentlemen have a number of novelties in the way of light music which will be played, but none of the old favorites will be neglected. Experience has shown that the general public takes more kindly to the old pieces than it does to the new. The general arrangements that have been in force for the last several years will rule this year. The amount of interest shown already seems to promise at least as successful a season of Pop concerts as last year, and that was the most successful they had ever had. The programme of the opening night will give the patrons an opportunity to hear for the first time a piece from the most successful of contemporary operas—Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna." This is the introduction to the third act.

Globe
April 28, 1912.

"Pop" Concerts to Open at Symphony Hall Next Week.

The sale of seats for the first week of the "Pop" concerts will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. No special nights as yet have been arranged for the first week, but Amherst College will have a night of its own in the early part of the season, and Tufts College will have its biennial night Tuesday evening, May 21.

This year the "Pops" will last but eight weeks instead of the usual nine, beginning Monday evening, May 6, and ending Saturday evening, June 29. Gustav Strube will be the conductor during the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre during the last four.

Both of these gentlemen have a number of novelties in the way of light music which will be played, but none of the old favorites will be neglected. The general arrangements that have been in force for the last several years will rule this year.

The program of the opening night

Transcript
April 29 1912.

THE programmes for the first week of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall, from Monday, May 6, through Saturday, May 11, do not differ in scheme or substance from those of recent years. Marches begin and end them; the waltzes and ballet music have their usual place; there are selections from serious operas usually Italian and melodious; there are overtures, preludes and other fragments of Wagner's music-dramas; the current musical plays—"The Siren," "The Pink Lady," "The Enchantress" and "The Count of Luxembourg"—have been laid under due contributions; there are amiable little "occasional pieces" about lead soldiers or water lilies; and for distinct novelty, the introductions to the second and the third acts of Wolf-Ferrari's opera, "The Jewels of the Madonna"—the first fragments of it to reach Bostonian ears [illegible]

[203

Journal
May 4, 1912.

"POPS" TO OPEN MONDAY NIGHT

Strube Conducts First Half of Season—Kubelik to Give Concert.

The twenty-seventh season of the Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall Monday evening, and for eight weeks the concerts will be given every evening except Sundays. Both conductors of last year have been engaged for this season—Mr. Strube for the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre for the last four.

In the programs of the coming season will be heard not only old favorites, but also the best tunes and selections from the musical comedies that have come out in the past year. Now and then will be given a "Special Night," devoted largely to German, French or Italian music. Both Mr. Strube and Mr. Maquarre have searched diligently during the past winter for new music of light and genial character.

The concert will last, as usual, from 8 to 11 o'clock. Both conductors are liberal in the matter of encores. John P. Marshall will be the organist. During the first half of the season the concert-master will be Jacques Hoffman, and during the second half William Krafft. The program for the opening night is as follows:

March, "The Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite "Sylvia"	Delibes
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Serenade	Strube
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Introduction to Act III, from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Il Guarany"	Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss
Selection, "The Pink Lady"	Caryll
March, "Hans Richter"	Schrammel

Herald
May 5, 1912.

THE POPS

Another spring brings with it the annual series of concerts in Symphony Hall known since 1885, when they began, as "The Pops," and the first concert will be given tomorrow (Monday) evening. In the beginning they were conducted on a serious plan modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, a little less serious than the regular Symphony concerts, with reduced orchestra and reduced prices, but still concerts for those who would take their music seriously. The success of this venture was not overwhelming and the idea came to the management to remove the rows of seats and replace them with tables and chairs, to serve light refreshments and generally replace the stiff formality of the winter season with an atmosphere of freedom. With the exception of a few years when there were no concerts, every spring since 1885 has seen a season of these concerts, first in Music Hall, and then since 1901 in Symphony Hall. While each year has seen the management catering to the physical comfort of the patrons, the Pops, in essence, remain unchanged and have become the most characteristic feature of the spring season in Boston. The orchestra is composed of 55 selected members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The conductors are musicians skilled in the making of popular programmes and thoroughly in touch with all new music of popular character. The latest novelties are played as well as the old and tried favorites. Now and then a touch of seriousness is given by a Wagner program or a Tschaikowsky programme, but never is the enticing Vienna waltz or the prize tune from the latest musical comedy neglected to make room for what some call "classics."

In recent years there has been a growing custom of having "special nights." Almost from the beginning Harvard University has had its own "night"; for many years "Tech night" has been a regular feature of the season. More recently other colleges have come in—Amherst, Williams, Boston, Dartmouth and Tufts—and these college "nights" are as popular with the general public as with those who are directly interested. Other "special nights" come from time to time. Boston is becoming more and more of a convention city and a "night" at the Pops is sure to be included in the plan of entertainment for visiting delegates.

The Pops this season will cover a period of eight weeks, from tomorrow evening, May 6, to Saturday evening, June 29. The concerts will be given every evening of the week except Sundays from eight to eleven. During the first four weeks the conductor is Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a composer of note, and one of the conductors of the annual Worcester county music festival. The conductor of the last half of the season will be Andre Maquarre, the eminent flute virtuoso of the Symphony orchestra. This is Mr. Maquarre's fourth season as a Pop conductor. In the first half of the season the concert master will be Jacques Hoffman; in the second half, William Krafft. John B. Marshall is again the organist. The program for the opening night is as follows:

March, "The Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite "Sylvia"	Delibes
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Serenade	Strube
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Introduction to Act III, from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Il Guarany"	Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss
Selection, "The Pink Lady"	Caryll
March, "Hans Richter"	Schrammel

Globe
May 5, 1912

Symphony Hall "Pop" Concerts Begin Tomorrow

Another Spring brings with it the annual series of concerts in Symphony Hall known since 1885, when they began, as the "Pops," and the first concert will be given tomorrow evening. In the beginning they were conducted on a serious plan modeled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, a little less serious than the regular Symphony concerts, with reduced orchestra and reduced prices, but still concerts for those who would take their music seriously.

The success of this venture was not overwhelming and the idea came to the management to make them popular in fact as well as in name; to remove the formal rows of seats and replace them with tables and chairs and serve such light refreshments as patrons listening to an evening of light music might want, and generally replace the stiff formality of the Winter season with an atmosphere of more genuine bohemianism.

With the exception of a few years when there were no concerts, every Spring since 1885 has seen a season of these concerts, first in old Music Hall and then, since 1901, in Symphony Hall.

The "Pops" are unique in the character and quality of the entertainment offered. The orchestra is composed of 55 selected members of Boston's Symphony Orchestra. The conductors are musicians skilled in the making of programs and in touch with new music of popular character that is being published. The latest novelties are played, as well as the old and tried favorites, and now and then a touch of seriousness is given by a Wagner program or a Tschaikowsky program.

In recent years there has been a growing custom of having "special nights." Almost from the beginning Harvard University has had its own "night"; for many years "Tech night" has been a regular feature of the season. More recently other colleges have come in—Amherst, Williams, Boston, Dartmouth and Tufts—and these college "nights" are as popular with the general public as with those who are directly interested. Other "special nights" come from time to time.

The "Pops" this season cover a period of eight weeks, from tomorrow evening, May 6, to Saturday evening, June 29. The concerts will be given, as usual, every evening of the week except Sundays from 8 to 11. During the first four weeks the conductor is Mr Gustav Strube. Mr Strube is one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a composer of note of music, both serious and gay, and is one of the conductors of the annual Worcester County music festival.

The conductor of the last half of the season will be Mr. Andre Maquarre, the eminent flute virtuoso of the Symphony Orchestra. This is Mr Maquarre's fourth season as a "Pop" conducter, and he is one of the best liked the concerts have had.

In the first half of the season the concert master will be Mr Jacques Hoffmann; in the second half, Mr William Kfarrt. Mr John B. Marshall is again the organist. The program for the opening night is as follows:

March, The Queen of Sheba	Gounod
Overture, Merry Wives of Windsor	Nicolai
Waltz, Girls of Baden	Komzak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite Sylvia	Delibes
Overture, Rienzi	Wagner
Serenade	Strube
Selection, Samson and Delilah	Saint-Saens
Introduction to Act III, from The Jewels of the Madonna	Wolf Ferrari
Overture, Il Guarany	Gomez
Waltz, Roses from the South	Strauss
Selection, The Pink Lady	Caryll
March, Hans Richter	Schrammel

Post
May 5, 1912

THE POPS

Another spring brings with it the annual series of concerts in Symphony Hall known since 1885, when they began, as the Pops, and the first concert will be given tomorrow (Monday) evening. In the beginning they were conducted on a serious plan, modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, a little less serious than the regular Symphony concerts, with reduced orchestra and reduced prices; but still concerts for those who would take their music seriously. The success of this venture was not overwhelming, and

Herald
May 5, 1912.

FIRST OF POPS TOMORROW

Twenty-seventh Season Will Open in Symphony Hall—Same Conductors.

The 27th season of the pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, and for eight weeks the concerts will be given every evening except Sundays. The pops have been growing in popularity and the promoters plan to make this year most successful.

Both conductors of last season have been engaged for this season—Mr. Strube for the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre for the last four. Old and tried favorites and the best tunes and selections from the recent musical comedies will be given. Now and then there will be a "special night," devoted largely to Wagner, Tschaikowsky, or German, French or Italian music.

The concert will last, as usual, from 8 to 11. On each program will be 12 numbers. Both conductors are liberal in the matter of encores, and this year, as last, the organ will be used several times a week. John P. Marshall will be the organist.

During the first half of the season the concert-master will be Jacques Hoffmann, and during the second half William Krafft. The program for tomorrow evening is as follows:

March, "The Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite "Sylvia"	Delibes
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Serenade	Strube
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Introduction to Act III, from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf Ferrari
Overture, "Il Guarany"	Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss
Selection, "The Pink Lady"	Caryll
March, "Hans Richter"	Schrammel

American
May 7, 1912

'POPS' OPEN TO MERRY THRONG

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

It did not seem much like Summer, but there was the big electric sign, "The Pops," on top of Symphony Hall, and inside the multitude of chairs and tables that replace the pew-like rows of seats when the calendar says that May has come.

"The Pops" are a queer institution to exist in this placid and extremely conventional city. How they ever got started away back a quarter of a century ago, and how they have continued to exist through the numerous spasms of Puritanism that the city has experienced, is something of a mystery.

But here they are, and how popular they are getting to be! There was hardly a vacant seat last night, either on the floor or in the balconies, and it is safe to say there will never be a night during the next eight weeks when there won't be a large and enjoyable audience on hand. The audience is really part of the show. It is nearly as enjoyable to watch it as it is to listen to the sober-sided Symphony men grinding out waltzes and comic opera selections.

Pretty Girls There.

All the pretty girls in Boston get taken to the Pops during the season, and if you think that Boston is not well fixed with pretty girls go to the Pops and learn to appreciate your city.

Another interesting feature of the Pops is the corps of waiters. They are always the same waiters. Some of them have been there for twenty years. How they earn their living during the part of the year when there are no Pops is another mystery. Maybe they hibernate with the squirrels.

They move about in time to the music. They wait until a fortissimo to pull a cork, and they set down their trays in perfect tempo.

Society was there. With the naked eye one couldn't distinguish society from you or me, but a society reporter with a pencil nearly fell over the balcony railing trying to see what Mrs. John L. Gardner had on.

Of course there was music. That is the why and wherefore of the Pops. You go to hear a concert and you are allowed to buy drinks and refreshments to sustain you till the end. If they were not allowed to purchase in this manner many prominent people would not go to the Pops. In this insiduous manner they are tricked into listening to three hours of semi-classical music, and the next thing you know they are buying season tickets for the Symphony orchestra.

Music Proves Treat.

Gustav Strube is the conductor. Mr. Strube is a year older than he was last year and he has composed several new pieces that we will undoubtedly hear before the season is over. He still leads in a downright and determined manner, and he remembers how to make delightful programs.

To me the most interesting feature of the program was the first performance in Boston of an intermezzo from Wolf Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna," an opera that was sung by the Chicago Opera Company last season.

It is a fantastic and fetching little piece, full of quaint and pretty themes treated in a charming and highly original manner. It is music that is truly worth while, and it is a pity that Chicago instead of Boston has heard the whole opera. There was also a serenade by Strube, likewise a dainty trifle, and the usual conglomeration of selections from grand operas and such things. Played by this orchestra of fifty-five members of the Symphony, this music was a great treat.

American
May 5, 1912.

Pop Concerts are With Us Again

Another Spring brings with it the annual series of concerts in Symphony Hall known since 1885, when they began as "The Pops," and the first concert will be given tomorrow evening.

In the beginning they were conducted on a serious plan modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, a little less serious than the regular Symphony concerts, with reduced orchestra and reduced prices, but still concerts for those who would take their music seriously.

The success of this venture was not overwhelming, and the idea came to the management to make them popular in fact as well as in name; to remove the formal rows of seats and replace them with tables and chairs, and serve such light refreshments as patrons listening to an evening of light music might want, and generally replace the stiff formality of the Winter season with an atmosphere of more genuine

With the exception of a few years when there were no concerts, every Spring since 1885 has seen a season of these concerts, first in old Music Hall and then, since 1901, in Symphony Hall. The orchestra is composed of fifty-five selected members of Boston's greatest artistic asset—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The conductors are musicians skilled in the making of popular programs and thoroughly in touch with all new music of popular character that is being published.

In recent years there has been a growing custom of having "Special Nights." Almost from the beginning Harvard University has had its own "night"; for many years "Tech Night" has been a regular feature of the season. More recently other colleges have come in—Amherst, Williams, Boston, Dartmouth and Tufts—and these college "nights" are as popular with the general public as with those who are directly interested. Other "Special Nights" come from time to time.

The Pops this season cover a period of eight weeks, from tomorrow evening, May 6, to Saturday evening, June 9. The concerts will be given, as usual, every evening of the week except Sundays from 8 to 11. During the first four weeks the conductor is Mr. Gustav Strube. The conductor of the last half of the season will be Mr. Andre Maquarre, the eminent flute virtuoso of the Symphony orchestra. The program for the opening night is as follows:

1. March, "The Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
2. Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor" ... Nicolai
3. Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ..... Komzak
4. Cortege de Bacchus from Suite "Sylvia" ..... Delibes
5. Overture, "Reinzi" ..... Wagner
6. Serenade ..... Strube
7. Selection, "Samson and Delilah" .. Saint-Saens
8. Introduction to Act III, from "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf Ferrari
9. Overture, "Il Guarany" ..... Gomez
10. Waltz, "Roses from the South" ..... Strauss
11. Selection, "The Pink Lady" ..... Caryll
12. March, "Hans Richter" ..... Schrammel

Transcript May 7, 1912.

PEPYS AT THE POPS

Being the Pages of His Boston Diary Dated May 6, 1912, and Now First Deciphered

THIS night, being a cold and unkind night, even for this cold and inclement May, to the great concert-room which is called Symphony Hall, and which is much changed for that the summer—as the social almanacks say—is come. All about were little tables close packed whereat did sit a multitude of folk—gentry, burghers, apprentices, the youth of the university, who do much affect these merry makings, and idlers from the coffee houses. A great company of women, too, all in their newest frocks and spencers and headgear of the spring, whereat my wife and two young sparks that she had brought with her (which was great folly) were much amused.

And they did babble of ribbons and feathers and other gauds and fashions till it was wearying to hear, while I smoked at my tobacco and thought soberly of them that must needs pay for all this finery. When they had done with this, they ogled about and discovered my lord This and his lady, and Mr. That the rich merchant, and Mr. Such, the limner and Mr. So, the poet, and who was with each of them. And to some they smiled to show their great acquaintance, whereas seeing others they nudged and smiled another way—as the saying is—out of the corner of the mouth.

But I, looking around and shutting my ears to all their babble, could discover only the haberdasher's boy, who in the afternoon had sold me my new and smart cravat. Seeing him, I pulled the harder at a tankard of ale—for it is lawful and even the mode to drink at this place—and thought upon the mutability of things and the strange minds of women. Between my thoughts I did gaze about upon the two galleries where sit they who care not to eat the sandwich—as they call them now after his lordship—and toy with comfits or drink at ale and beer and wine or even burn the tobacco. For there be still many sober as well as gamesome folk in this town, and all and sundry go to this music-making.

When my women had stilled themselves for a little while I heard the music gladly. A great band of many instruments sitting upon a platform made it—violins of many kinds and piping flutes and hautboys, brazen trumpets and drums smitten lustily. Over all this band to give the time was Master Strube, who did lead in right lively fashion, as though he liked it no less than did the folk. And some around whispered my wife that he had not made his music so spiritedly for many a year.

As for me, the fumes of sentiment rose to my brain like the fumes of tobacco to my nostril, which is my way when I hear music. As the band played the waltz I bethought myself of my loves early and agone, and how my wife knew not of them, nor even suspected. Yet had I stepped dances with them to those same waltzes. Whereat I smiled, while my wife and her sparks did believe that I was smiling at thought of "The Pink Lady," which the band played next and which had much delighted me and all this town not many months back. When Master Strube came to his opera tunes, like that with which Delilah tricks Samson, then were the women still, for they do like, though they should be past such things or too unripe for them, the song of love.

Between whiles came the critick of music, whom I know at the coffee house, to tell me how the next tune was out of a great new opera, "The Jewels of the Madonna," which we shall hear next year. When it was done, I did think it merely a jigging Italian tune such as they play upon guitars and such. Whereupon he told me it should be so, since it was a serenade of Naples in an opera of low folk. For my part, I do not understand these matters and care not to understand them, preferring the old Largo of Master Händel, which the band did play as an extra. Whereat my wife, who was now aweary of her gossip and her ogling, and who pretended that she disliked the smoke that she might show her new smelling bottle, said that I was a bourgeois. But if I be so, what then, said I, are you, since we be one flesh? Whereat she tossed her head and said it was time for the sparks to go home. So into the mud again, and home and to bed, after a merry evening, which is good for young and old in the spring time. But, for the old, it is not good to mix the ale of Bass and the wine of the Rhineland. I must try to remember.

Traveler
April 27, 1912

THE POP CONCERTS.

The sale of seats for the first week of the Pop concerts will open at Symphony Hall Monday morning. No special nights as yet have been arranged for the first week, but Amherst College will have a night of its own in the early part of the season, and Tufts College will have its biennial night Tuesday evening, May 21. This year the Pops will last but eight weeks, instead of the usual nine, beginning on Monday evening, May 6, and ending Saturday evening, June 29. Gustav Strube will be the conductor during the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre during the last four. Both of these gentlemen have a number of novelties in the way of light music which will be played, but none of the old favorites will be neglected. The programme of the opening night will give the patrons an opportunity to hear for the first time a piece from the most successful of contemporary operas—Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna."

Journal
April 27, 1912

Pop Concerts

The sale of seats for the first week of the Pop concerts will open at Symphony Hall Monday morning. Tufts College will have its biennial night on Tuesday, May 21. This year the Pops will last but eight weeks, beginning on Monday evening, May 6. Gustav Strube will be the conductor during the first four weeks. The season promises to be the most successful on record. The program of the opening night will give the patrons an opportunity to hear for the first time a piece from the most successful of contemporary operas—Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna." This is the introduction to the third act.

Post
April 28, 1912

THE POP CONCERTS

The sale of seats for the first week of the Pop concerts will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning. No special nights as yet have been arranged for the first week, but Amherst College will have a night of its own in the early part of the season and Tufts College will have its biennial night on Tuesday evening, May 21. This year the Pops will last but eight weeks instead of the usual nine, beginning on Monday evening, May 6, and ending Saturday evening, June 29. Gustav Strube will be the conductor during the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre during the last four. Both of these gentlemen have a number of novelties in the way of light music which will be played, but none of the old favorites will be neglected. Experience has shown that the general public takes more kindly to the old pieces than it does to the new. The general arrangements that have been in force for the last several years will rule this year. The amount of interest shown already seems to promise at least as successful a season of Pop concerts as last year, and that was the most successful they had ever had. The programme of the opening night will give the patrons an opportunity to hear for the first time a piece from the most successful of contemporary operas—Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna." This is the introduction

Globe
April 28, 1912.

"Pop" Concerts to Open at Symphony Hall Next Week.

The sale of seats for the first week of the "Pop" concerts will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. No special nights as yet have been arranged for the first week, but Amherst College will have a night of its own in the early part of the season, and Tufts College will have its biennial night Tuesday evening, May 21.

This year the "Pops" will last but eight weeks instead of the usual nine, beginning Monday evening, May 6, and ending Saturday evening, June 29. Gustav Strube will be the conductor during the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre during the last four.

Both of these gentlemen have a number of novelties in the way of light music which will be played, but none of the old favorites will be neglected. The general arrangements that have been in force for the last several years will rule this year.

The program of the opening night

Transcript
April 29, 1912.

THE programmes for the first week of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall, from Monday, May 6, through Saturday, May 11, do not differ in scheme or substance from those of recent years. Marches begin and end them; the waltzes and ballet music have their usual place; there are selections from serious operas usually Italian and melodious; there are overtures, preludes and other fragments of Wagner's music-dramas; the current musical plays—"The Siren," "The Pink Lady," "The Enchantress" and "The Count of Luxembourg"—have been laid under due contributions; there are amiable little "occasional pieces" about lead soldiers or water lilies; and for distinct novelty, the introductions to the second and the third acts of Wolf-Ferrari's opera, "The Jewels of the Madonna"—the first fragments of it to reach Bostonian ears by name.

[203

Journal
May 4, 1912.

"POPS" TO OPEN MONDAY NIGHT

Strube Conducts First Half of Season—Kubelik to Give Concert.

The twenty-seventh season of the Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall Monday evening, and for eight weeks the concerts will be given every evening except Sundays. Both conductors of last year have been engaged for this season—Mr. Strube for the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre for the last four.

In the programs of the coming season will be heard not only old favorites, but also the best tunes and selections from the musical comedies that have come out in the past year. Now and then will be given a "Special Night," devoted largely to German, French or Italian music. Both Mr. Strube and Mr. Maquarre have searched diligently during the past winter for new music of light and genial character.

The concert will last, as usual, from 8 to 11 o'clock. Both conductors are liberal in the matter of encores. John P. Marshall will be the organist. During the first half of the season the concert-master will be Jacques Hoffman, and during the second half William Krafft. The program for the opening night is as follows:

March, "The Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite "Sylvia"	Delibes
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Serenade	Strube
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Introduction to act III., from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf Ferrari
Overture, "Il Guarany"	Gomez
Waltz, "Roses From the South"	Strauss
Selection, "The Pink Lady"	Caryll
March, "Hans Richter"	Schrammel

Herald
May 5, 1912.

THE POPS

Another spring brings with it the annual series of concerts in Symphony Hall known since 1885, when they began, as "The Pops," and the first concert will be given tomorrow (Monday) evening. In the beginning they were conducted on a serious plan modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, a little less serious than the regular Symphony concerts, with reduced orchestra and reduced prices, but still concerts for those who would take their music seriously. The success of this venture was not overwhelming and the idea came to the management to remove the rows of seats and replace them with tables and chairs, to serve light refreshments and generally replace the stiff formality of the winter season with an atmosphere of freedom. With the exception of a few years when there were no concerts, every spring since 1885 has seen a season of these concerts, first in Music Hall, and then since 1901 in Symphony Hall. While each year has seen the management catering to the physical comfort of the patrons, the Pops, in essence, remain unchanged and have become the most characteristic feature of the spring season in Boston. The orchestra is composed of 55 selected members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The conductors are musicians skilled in the making of popular programmes and thoroughly in touch with all new music of popular character. The latest novelties are played as well as the old and tried favorites. Now and then a touch of seriousness is given by a Wagner program or a Tschaikowsky programme, but never is the enticing Vienna waltz or the prize tune from the latest musical comedy neglected to make room for what some call "classics."

In recent years there has been a growing custom of having "special nights." Almost from the beginning Harvard University has had its own "night"; for many years "Tech night" has been a regular feature of the season. More recently other colleges have come in—Amherst, Williams, Boston, Dartmouth and Tufts—and these college "nights" are as popular with the general public as with those who are directly interested. Other "special nights" come from time to time. Boston is becoming more and more of a convention city and a "night" at the Pops is sure to be included in the plan of entertainment for visiting delegates.

The Pops this season will cover a period of eight weeks, from tomorrow evening, May 6, to Saturday evening, June 29. The concerts will be given every evening of the week except Sundays from eight to eleven. During the first four weeks the conductor is Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a composer of note, and one of the conductors of the annual Worcester county music festival. The conductor of the last half of the season will be Andre Maquarre, the eminent flute virtuoso of the Symphony orchestra. This is Mr. Maquarre's fourth season as a Pop conductor. In the first half of the season the concert master will be Jacques Hoffman; in the second half, William Krafft. John B. Marshall is again the organist. The program for the opening night is as follows:

March, "The Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite "Sylvia"	Delibes
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Serenade	Strube
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Introduction to Act III, from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf Ferrari
Overture, "Il Guarany"	Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss
Selection, "The Pink Lady"	Caryll
March, "Hans Richter"	Schrammel

Globe
May 5, 1912.

Symphony Hall "Pop"
Concerts Begin Tomorrow

Another Spring brings with it the annual series of concerts in Symphony Hall known since 1885, when they began, as the "Pops," and the first concert will be given tomorrow evening. In the beginning they were conducted on a serious plan modeled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, a little less serious than the regular Symphony concerts, with reduced orchestra and reduced prices, but still concerts for those who would take their music seriously.

The success of this venture was not overwhelming and the idea came to the management to make them popular in fact as well as in name; to remove the formal rows of seats and replace them with tables and chairs and serve such light refreshments as patrons listening to an evening of light music might want, and generally replace the stiff formality of the Winter season with an atmosphere of more genuine bohemianism.

With the exception of a few years when there were no concerts, every Spring since 1885 has seen a season of these concerts, first in old Music Hall and then, since 1901, in Symphony Hall.

The "Pops" are unique in the character and quality of the entertainment offered. The orchestra is composed of 55 selected members of Boston's Symphony Orchestra. The conductors are musicians skilled in the making of programs and in touch with new music of popular character that is being published. The latest novelties are played, as well as the old and tried favorites, and now and then a touch of seriousness is given by a Wagner program or a Tschaikowsky program.

In recent years there has been a growing custom of having "special nights." Almost from the beginning Harvard University has had its own "night"; for many years "Tech night" has been a regular feature of the season. More recently other colleges have come in—Amherst, Williams, Boston, Dartmouth and Tufts—and these college "nights" are as popular with the general public as with those who are directly interested. Other "special nights" come from time to time.

The "Pops" this season cover a period of eight weeks, from tomorrow evening, May 6, to Saturday evening, June 29. The concerts will be given, as usual, every evening of the week except Sundays from 8 to 11. During the first four weeks the conductor is Mr Gustav Strube. Mr Strube is one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a composer of note of music, both serious and gay, and is one of the conductors of the annual Worcester County music festival.

The conductor of the last half of the season will be Mr Andre Maquarre, the eminent flute virtuoso of the Symphony Orchestra. This is Mr Maquarre's fourth season as a "Pop" conductor, and he is one of the best liked the concerts have had.

In the first half of the season the concert master will be Mr Jacques Hoffmann; in the second half, Mr William Kfarrt. Mr John B. Marshall is again the organist. The program for the opening night is as follows:

March, The Queen of Sheba	Gounod
Overture, Merry Wives of Windsor	Nicolai
Waltz, Girls of Baden	Komzak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite Sylvia	Delibes
Overture, Rienzi	Wagner
Serenade	Strube
Selection, Samson and Delilah	Saint-Saens
Introduction to Act III, from The Jewels of the Madonna	Wolf Ferrari
Overture, Il Guarany	Gomez
Waltz, Roses from the South	Strauss
Selection, The Pink Lady	Caryll
March, Hans Richter	Schrammel

Post
May 5, 1912.

THE POPS

Another spring brings with it the annual series of concerts in Symphony Hall known since 1885, when they began, as the Pops, and the first concert will be given tomorrow (Monday) evening. In the beginning they were conducted on a serious plan, modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, a little less serious than the regular Symphony concerts, with reduced orchestra and reduced prices; but still concerts for those who would take their music seriously. The success of this venture was not overwhelming, and

Herald
May 5, 1912.

FIRST OF POPS TOMORROW

Twenty-seventh Season Will Open in Symphony Hall—Same Conductors.

The 27th season of the pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, and for eight weeks the concerts will be given every evening except Sundays. The pops have been growing in popularity and the promoters plan to make this year most successful.

Both conductors of last season have been engaged for this season—Mr. Strube for the first four weeks and Andre Maquarre for the last four. Old and tried favorites and the best tunes and selections from the recent musical comedies will be given. Now and then there will be a "special night," devoted largely to Wagner, Tschaikowsky, or German, French or Italian music.

The concert will last, as usual, from 8 to 11. On each program will be 12 numbers. Both conductors are liberal in the matter of encores, and this year, as last, the organ will be used several times a week. John P. Marshall will be the organist.

During the first half of the season the concert-master will be Jacques Hoffmann, and during the second half William Krafft. The program for tomorrow evening is as follows:

March, "The Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
Cortege de Bacchus from Suite "Sylvia"	Delibes
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Serenade	Strube
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Introduction to Act III, from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf Ferrari
Overture, "Il Guarany"	Gomez
Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss
Selection, "The Pink Lady"	Caryll
March, "Hans Richter"	Schrammel

American
May 7, 1912.

'POPS' OPEN TO MERRY THRONG

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

It did not seem much like Summer, but there was the big electric sign, "The Pops," on top of Symphony Hall, and inside the multitude of chairs and tables that replace the pew-like rows of seats when the calendar says that May has come.

"The Pops" are a queer institution to exist in this placid and extremely conventional city. How they ever got started away back a quarter of a century ago, and how they have continued to exist through the numerous spasms of Puritanism that the city has experienced, is something of a mystery.

But here they are, and how popular they are getting to be! There was hardly a vacant seat last night, either on the floor or in the balconies, and it is safe to say there will never be a night during the next eight weeks when there won't be a large and enjoyable audience on hand. The audience is really part of the show. It is nearly as enjoyable to watch it as it is to listen to the sober-sided Symphony men grinding out waltzes and comic opera selections.

Pretty Girls There.

All the pretty girls in Boston get taken to the Pops during the season, and if you think that Boston is not well fixed with pretty girls go to the Pops and learn to appreciate your city.

Another interesting feature of the Pops is the corps of waiters. They are always the same waiters. Some of them have been there for twenty years. How they earn their living during the part of the year when there are no Pops is another mystery. Maybe they hibernate with the squirrels.

They move about in time to the music. They wait until a fortissimo to pull a cork, and they set down their trays in perfect tempo.

Society was there. With the naked eye one couldn't distinguish society from you or me, but a society reporter with a pencil nearly fell over the balcony railing trying to see what Mrs. John L. Gardner had on.

Of course there was music. That is the why and wherefore of the Pops. You go to hear a concert and you are allowed to buy drinks and refreshments to sustain you till the end. If they were not allowed to purchase in this manner many prominent people would not go to the Pops. In this insiduous manner they are tricked into listening to three hours of semi-classical music, and the next thing you know they are buying season tickets for the Symphony orchestra.

Music Proves Treat.

Gustav Strube is the conductor. Mr. Strube is a year older than he was last year and he has composed several new pieces that we will undoubtedly hear before the season is over. He still leads in a downright and determined manner, and he remembers how to make delightful programs.

To me the most interesting feature of the program was the first performance in Boston of an intermezzo from Wolf Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna," an opera that was sung by the Chicago Opera Company last season.

It is a fantastic and fetching little piece, full of quaint and pretty themes treated in a charming and highly original manner. It is music that is truly worth while, and it is a pity that Chicago instead of Boston has heard the whole opera. There was also a serenade by Strube, likewise a dainty trifle, and the usual conglomeration of selections from grand operas and such things. Played by this orchestra of fifty-five members of the Symphony, this music was a great treat.

American
May 5, 1912.

Pop Concerts are With Us Again

Another Spring brings with it the annual series of concerts in Symphony Hall known since 1885, when they began as "The Pops," and the first concert will be given tomorrow evening.

In the beginning they were conducted on a serious plan modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, a little less serious than the regular Symphony concerts, with reduced orchestra and reduced prices, but still concerts for those who would take their music seriously.

The success of this venture was not overwhelming, and the idea came to the management to make them popular in fact as well as in name; to remove the formal rows of seats and replace them with tables and chairs, and serve such light refreshments as patrons listening to an evening of light music might want, and generally replace the stiff formality of the Winter season with an atmosphere of more genuine

With the exception of a few years when there were no concerts, every Spring since 1885 has seen a season of these concerts, first in old Music Hall and then, since 1901, in Symphony Hall. The orchestra is composed of fifty-five selected members of Boston's greatest artistic asset—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The conductors are musicians skilled in the making of popular programs and thoroughly in touch with all new music of popular character that is being published.

In recent years there has been a growing custom of having "Special Nights." Almost from the beginning Harvard University has had its own "night"; for many years "Tech Night" has been a regular feature of the season. More recently other colleges have come in—Amherst, Williams, Boston, Dartmouth and Tufts—and these college "nights" are as popular with the general public as with those who are directly interested. Other "Special Nights" come from time to time.

The Pops this season cover a period of eight weeks, from tomorrow evening, May 6, to Saturday evening, June 9. The concerts will be given, as usual, every evening of the week except Sundays from 8 to 11. During the first four weeks the conductor is Mr. Gustav Strube. The conductor of the last half of the season will be Mr. Andre Maquarre, the eminent flute virtuoso of the Symphony orchestra. The program for the opening night is as follows:

1. March, "The Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
2. Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
3. Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak
4. Cortege de Bacchus from Suite "Sylvia"	Delibes
5. Overture, "Reinzi"	Wagner
6. Serenade	Strube
7. Selection, "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
8. Introduction to Act III, from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf Ferrari
9. Overture, "Il Guarany"	Gomez
10. Waltz, "Roses from the South"	Strauss
11. Selection, "The Pink Lady"	Caryll
12. March, "Hans Richter"	Schrammel

Transcript
May 7, 1912.

PEPYS AT THE POPS

Being the Pages of His Boston Diary Dated May 6, 1912, and Now First Deciphered

THIS night, being a cold and unkind night, even for this cold and inclement May, to the great concert-room which is called Symphony Hall, and which is much changed for that the summer—as the social almanacks say—is come. All about were little tables close packed whereat did sit a multitude of folk—gentry, burghers, apprentices, the youth of the university, who do much affect these merry makings, and idlers from the coffee houses. A great company of women, too, all in their newest frocks and spencers and headgear of the spring, whereat my wife and two young sparks that she had brought with her (which was great folly) were much amused.

And they did babble of ribbons and feathers and other gauds and fashions till it was wearying to hear, while I smoked at my tobacco and thought soberly of them that must needs pay for all this finery. When they had done with this, they ogled about and discovered my lord This and his lady, and Mr. That the rich merchant, and Mr. Such, the limner and Mr. So, the poet, and who was with each of them. And to some they smiled to show their great acquaintance, whereas seeing others they nudged and smiled another way—as the saying is—out of the corner of the mouth.

But I, looking around and shutting my ears to all their babble, could discover only the haberdasher's boy, who in the afternoon had sold me my new and smart cravat. Seeing him, I pulled the harder at a tankard of ale—for it is lawful and even the mode to drink at this place—and thought upon the mutability of things and the strange minds of women. Between my thoughts I did gaze about upon the two galleries where sit they who care not to eat the sandwich—as they call them now after his lordship—and toy with comfits or drink at ale and beer and wine or even burn the tobacco. For there be still many sober as well as gamesome folk in this town, and all and sundry go to this music-making.

When my women had stilled themselves for a little while I heard the music gladly. A great band of many instruments sitting upon a platform made it—violins of many kinds and piping flutes and hautboys, brazen trumpets and drums smitten lustily. Over all this band to give the time was Master Strube, who did lead in right lively fashion, as though he liked it no less than did the folk. And some around whispered my wife that he had not made his music so spiritedly for many a year.

As for me, the fumes of sentiment rose to my brain like the fumes of tobacco to my nostril, which is my way when I hear music. As the band played the waltz I bethought myself of my loves early and agone, and how my wife knew not of them, nor even suspected. Yet had I stepped dances with them to those same waltzes. Whereat I smiled, while my wife and her sparks did believe that I was smiling at thought of "The Pink Lady," which the band played next and which had much delighted me and all this town not many months back. When Master Strube came to his opera tunes, like that with which Delilah tricks Samson, then were the women still, for they do like, though they should be past such things or too unripe for them, the song of love.

Between whiles came the critick of music, whom I know at the coffee house, to tell me how the next tune was out of a great new opera, "The Jewels of the Madonna," which we shall hear next year. When it was done, I did think it merely a jigging Italian tune such as they play upon guitars and such. Whereupon he told me it should be so, since it was a serenade of Naples in an opera of low folk. For my part, I do not understand these matters and care not to understand them, preferring the old Largo of Master Händel, which the band did play as an extra. Whereat my wife, who was now aweary of her gossip and her ogling, and who pretended that she disliked the smoke that she might show her new smelling bottle, said that I was a bourgeois. But if I be so, what then, said I, are you, since we be one flesh? Whereat she tossed her head and said it was time for the sparks to go home. So into the mud again, and home and to bed, after a merry evening, which is good for young and old in the spring time. But, for the old, it is not good to mix the ale of Bass and the wine of the Rhineland. I must try to remember.

Post May 7, 1912

SEASON OF 1912 POPS NOW OPEN

Record Audience at Symphony Hall Enjoys Music

There is certainly no audience in Boston so diverse and so representative of nearly every class of people in the city as the audience that gathers, night in and night out, but especially for the opening night, when the Pop concerts are on in Symphony Hall.

Last night, in spite of the bad weather, the audience for the first Pop concert of 1912 was larger, if anything, on the floor than the same audience last year, and but little smaller in the galleries.

And last year was accounted the most successful in the history of these concerts.

COSMOPOLITAN AUDIENCE

Seated about the tables on the floor you may see the maid and the matron, the fresh young man from college, the business man, the artist, musician, newspaper man, the family group, the party gotten up for the evening, wearing just a few thousand dollars' worth of clothes, the larky and ill-assured youth with his beaming inamorata, the type, or species, slangily known as "actorine" and likewise well upholstered for the occasion, the heavy jowled and the middle aged, the dress suit and the turned-up trousers, more colors than ever graced the coat of Joseph, and more styles than any one continent could furnish in several seasons. An eager and unlovely swain, anchored by his bride-to-be. Even a "high-brow" music critic or two, who, perhaps, has been feeding his winter's spleen on firewater of various strengths, who now have declared temporary truce with artists, managers and public, lolls contendedly in his chair, over a claret lemonade, and calls to his neighbor across tables, "Pretty good for a change, isn't it?"

And so on; women who decide who's who in the social game; men whose names mean things in finance or politics. The list would be endless. The talk is infinite in its variety. There is billing and cooing; even yet, heaven save the mark, musical discussion; milliners are extolled, waiters are threatened, from one side a political argument waxing hot, from the other discussion of the price of beef and summer cottages.

They all sit fairly still while the orchestra plays, and during the intermission some of the musicians come down from the stage and chat with their friends. After the "Rienzi" overture there is a crash of applause. In spite of the conductor's decision to the contrary, the roar continues until he is forced to give in, and the splendid old melody thunders out again. There are trifles light as air, played nearly as lightly, as extras. Handel's piece is followed by a lilting Strauss waltz, and the waltz by a "Pink Lady" selection.

The programme tonight, Gustav Strube conducting, will consist of compositions by Berlioz ("Rakoczy" march), Rossini, Strauss (waltz, "Die Fledermaus"), Burgmein (suite, "Carnaval Venitien"), Bizet (Carmen selections), Tschaikowsky ("Nutcracker Suite"), Wagner (prelude to "Lohengrin"), Herbert (Irish rhapsody), Elgar, Massenet ("Meditation," from appeared shortly after 8 o'clock. As if to start the season in fitting manner, the blare of the brasses was the first response to Conductor Strube's baton in the opening measures of Gounod's "The Queen of Sheba."

Same Strube as of Yore

It was the same Strube of other years who insisted that the audience become quiet for the soft, sweet strains of the opening bars of Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," by rapping smartly and long with his baton. Insistent demand for an encore was graciously met by Mr. Strube.

Softened rolling of the drums opened Komzak's waltz, "The Girls of Baden," and a repitition of its last movement was the encore which Mr. Strube gave this time. In the overture, "Rienzi," by Wagner, following the first intermission, the brasses had their first real innings of the evening, and with the assistance of the wood wind, sent blasts out over the audience that effectively drowned the hum of conversation. The encore was well contrasted with the Wagnerian blasts, for Mr. Strube gave his audience a soft, catchy waltz, that evoked as much applause as its predecessor.

The success of Mr. Strube's serenade was not all due to the popularity of its composer, for the stirring of the spectators, evincing an interest in what was to come, was satisfactorily rewarded with the playing of the piece. A solo by Concert-master Jacques Hoffmann and the blending of the strings and wood wind gave a very effective coloring to the short piece. The audience demanded that it be repeated, and it was.

The broad passages of Saint-Saens's "Samson and Delilah," in which every piece in the big orchestra had a share, including solo work by the oboe, harp and bells, and the sudden changes of the inaroduction to Act 3 of "The Jewels of the Madonna," by Wolf-Ferrari, finished the second third of the program.

Organ Is Heard

Following the second intermission came the picturesque and even wild strains of Gomez's overture, "Il Guarany." Not the least of the evening's successes was an extra, an orchestration of sacred music, in which the organ furnished a background. Strauss's waltz, "The Roses From the South," set everybody swaying with its rhythm. A selection from "The Pink Lady" and Schrammel's march, "Hans Richter," ended a program that was worthy the setting of an opening night.

The following program will be played tonight:

March from "Damnation of Faust"....Berlioz
Overture, "The Barber of Seville"....Rossini
Waltz, "Die Fledermaus".....Strauss
Carnaval. Venetien.....Burgmein
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Two Movements from "The Nut-Cracker Suite".....Tschaikowsky
(a) Danse de Mirlitons.
(b) Danse Russe Trepak.
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
Organ, Mr. Marshall
Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet
Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffman
Selection, "The Siren".....Fall
March, "Mit Standarten".....Blon

Journal May 7, 1912.

"POPS" OPEN IN BLAZE OF GLORY

Notable Gathering Fills Symphony Hall and Encores Are Frequent.

Gustav Strube and his band of Symphony players opened the twenty-seventh season of Boston's Pop concerts last evening in Symphony Hall with a flourish. The first-night audience was an enthusiastic one, and Mr. Strube was compelled to lead his players through encore after encore. In fact almost every number on the program was encored, and several of the encores, notably a selection from the "Tales of Hoffmann," created a demand for an encore of the encore which Mr. Strube was obliged to refuse because of the length of the program.

Every table on the floor of the big auditorium was taken, and there were many society notables present with their families and parties of friends. Remembering Conductor Strube's successes in the past, the large audience gave him a hearty welcome when he

Journal May 8, 1912

Wagner and Amherst Nights at the Pops

This evening the following program will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall:

March, "The Comet".....Strube
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Selection, "The Pink Lady".....Caryll
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Liszt
"Ave Maria".....Schubert
'Cello solo, Mr. J. Keller
Entree Triomphale des Boyards.....Halverson
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Raymond".....Thomas
Serenade.....Strube
Gavotte.....Gebhard
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
March, "King Karl".....Unrath

The second week of the Pops opens Monday evening with Mr. Strube's first Wagner night. The first college night of the season comes next Wednesday, when Amherst celebrates. A number of characteristic Amherst songs will appear on the program. Harvard night will come a week from Monday. This is the big event of the year at the Pops. The Harvard Glee Club will sing during intermissions. The program for Monday night is as follows:

Coronation march.....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Stradella".....Flotow
Waltz, "Donauweibchen".....Strauss
Selection, "La Traviata".....Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Overture, "Tannhauser"
Funeral march, from "The Dusk of the Gods"
Ride of the Valkyries
Wagner
Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Prelude to "The Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Selection, "Gypsy Love".....Lehar
March, "Boston—1915".....Strube.

Advertiser May 11, 1912.

The Pops.

The first week of the Pops, which ends tonight, shows the expected increase of business over last year, for these concerts in recent years have grown steadily every season. The coming week will have the attraction of two special nights. Monday Mr. Strube has his first "Wagner Night." "Wagner Nights" are always very popular.

Wednesday brings the first college night of the season—Amherst. This is the third year in which the Amherst alumni and undergraduates have joined in a celebration at the Pops.

Advertiser May 7, 1912.

THE 27TH SERIES OF POPS OPENS VERY AUSPICIOUS

Gustav Strube Leads n Symph Band—The Customary Sprinkling Fashion in Evidence.

By S. C. Williams.

Spring is tardy, but the "Pops" fo promptly the Symphony season. The series of these concerts, probably the offered in any beer garden the world o began in Symphony hall, last night. Gustav Strube conducted and the sprinkling of fashion customary on first nights was in evidence, with as many of hoi polloi as could comfortably gain admission.

The programme was one of the sort proven by long experience to be agreeable to man as he sits and smokes, and tries to sip at his ease. Wagner, Gounod, Delibes, Strauss, and the new comer, Wolf-Ferrari,—mostly excerpts of opera, with an occasional waltz or invigorating march. The band, as heretofore made up of 55 Boston Symphony men, played as if they enjoyed doing so, and thoroughly succeeded in pleasing their auditors. Encores insistently demanded were generously given, and the season opened auspiciously, despite drizzled discouragement from the sky.

It is agreeable to note, from year to year, Pop patrons' increasing grasp of the art of relaxation. Time was when the innocent stranger who pounded a table to signify enthusiasm was regarded as one who has wantonly kicked his grandmother's tomb. Mr. and Mrs. Boston have mellowed since then. The starched shirt no longer stiffens a starched spirit, and ladies of the Back Bay Ghetto sit sociably near the less elect. A genial air prevails.

Tonight this programme will be played:—

1. March from "Damnation of Faust"...Berlioz
2. Overture, "The Barber of Seville"....Rossini
3. Waltz, "Die Fledermaus".....Strauss
4. Carnaval Venetien.....Burgmein
   (a) Florindo.
   (b) Rosaura.
   (c) Colombine.
   (d) Arlequin.
5. Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
6. Two movements from "The Nut-Cracker Suite".....Tschaikowsky
   (a) Danse de Mirlitons.
   (b) Danse Russe Trepak.
7. Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
8. Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
9. March, "Pomp and Circumstance"....Elgar. Organ, Mr. Marshall.
10. Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet. Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffmann.
11. Selection, "The Siren".....Fall
12. March, "Mit Standarten".....Blon

Globe, May 13, 1912.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Wagner Evening at "The Pops."

New Rival Tenors In London Opera Houses.

Reminiscences of Felicia Lyne's Teacher—Notes.

The second week of the "pops" opens tomorrow with Mr Strube's first "Wagner Night." As is the custom on such occasions, he devotes the second part of the program to important Wagner selections, and these programs have always had a great attraction for the audiences.

The first "College Night" of the season comes next Wednesday, May 15, when Amherst celebrates. Amherst is very strong in Boston, its alumni are most enthusiastic and in the two past years the Amherst celebrations have been second in point of attendance and enthusiasm only to "Harvard Nights." Amherst men are famous singers and a number of characteristic Amherst songs will appear on the program.

The annual "Harvard Night" is set for a week from tomorrow, Monday, May 20. This is the really big event of the year at the "pop" concerts. The Harvard Glee Club will be in attendance and will sing during intermissions. The program for tomorrow night is as follows:

Coronation March.....Meyerbeer
Overture, Stradella.....Flotow
Waltz, Donauweibchen.....Strauss
Selection, La Traviata.....Verdi
Prelude to Lohengrin.....Wagner
Overture, Tannhauser.....Wagner
Funeral March from The Dusk of the Gods
Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Overture, Masaniello.....Auber
Prelude to The Deluge.....Saint-Saens
Selection, Gypsy Love.....Lehar
March, Boston-1915.....Strube

Journal May 14, 1912.

"Wagner Night" at The Pop Concerts

Wagnerian music prevailed at the Pops last night, but there were also lighter tunes to please the more popular taste and lend the variety which makes Pop music all around the best of the year. Conductor Strube is an adept at making pleasing programs. This Wagner night was the first of the special events of the brief Pop season. Tomorrow night will come Amherst night. The Amherst boys are famous for their singing. Tonight's program will be as follows:

March, "Merry Soldiers".....Sabathil
Overture, "The Bronze Horse".....Auber
Waltz, "Rain of Gold".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Mikado".....Sullivan
Selection, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Two Entr' Actes from "Carmen".....Bizet
Hungarian Rhapsody, in F.....Liszt
Fire Charm, from "Die Walkure".....Wagner
Overture, "Orpheus".....Offenbach
The Rosary.....Nevin
The Enchanted Hour.....Mouton
Selection, "The Siren".....Fall
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppe

Globe May 21, 1912

HARVARD NIGHT AT "POPS."

Lively Time Enjoyed by Great Audience, With Singing by the Glee Club and Special Stunts.

"The Pops" flourished again last night to the glory of the sons of Harvard, and of the cause of learning. It was a noble sight to see the zealous young collegians grouped about the tables on the floor, deep in their studies, in a flamboyant flower garden of millinery, and in the beverages that have made more than one town famous.

The glee club encamped in the northeast corner of the room and filled both the idle moments and the public ear. During the first recess it uncorked a masterpiece of erudition, pages, reams of egyptology, neurology, Euripides, who knows, wedded to yards of tune, a round-up, brood, platoon, avalanche of this season's classic ragtime hits, spliced, dovetailed, mortised and otherwised spiked together. The stars of the track team in the 440 and the mile finished without turning a hair. A few experienced an obvious touch of the heaves. It was an amazing demonstration of the prowess of the institution as a home of the art of song.

Nor was this the sole exhibition of vocal skill. The ghost of "The Ham Tree" shrunk into a sandwich at the performance of Deane W. Hanscom in "The Barber's Ball," with Frank R. Hancock at the piano. Both these gentlemen hope to be graduated this year if they can escape vaudeville. With the loud mention of Ralph Bunker in "Dixie" with the glee club playing at quarterback and both ends the catalogue of blackface artists is for the present complete.

While the variety show was not improvising in this manner the orchestra was permitted to play. The time-honored memory of the Harvard Musical Association, the parent of all those bodies who eke out a living by playing symphonies, at last came to its just reward. A succession of pieces from some of the young purveyors to the best comic opera trade, kept spirits high and mirth lively. Fletcher ('07), Cheney ('12), Blaikie ('14), Hancock ('12), Clifton ('12), Perley ('12), Davidson ('06) and others saw the crowd warm to their creations in a manner that might have carried a pertinent admonition—for instance, to one Edward Elgar, who, even after having written a first symphony, wrote a second.

Edward Burlingame Hill was represented by a graceful trifle, his "Moth Dance." J. E. Mitchell, '14, displayed a good technic in a Widor toccata, and a march, "Veritas," by Mr Densmore made entire repose by some a difficult thing. Finally Victor Herbert's militant American Fantasy brought the great audience to its feet, applauding and singing in the "Columbia" and the "Star Spangled Banner." The quartet sang and "Fair Harvard" and a march closed a lively program.

Traveler, May 11

WAGNER NIGHT AT "POPS" ON MONDAY

THE first week of the Pops, which ends tonight, shows the expected increase of business over last year for these concerts in recent years have grown steadily every season. The coming week will have the attraction of two special nights. Monday Mr. Strube has his first "Wagner night." As those who go to the Pops from year to year know, this does not mean that the whole programme is devoted to Wagner, but he bunches four numbers in the second part. These four numbers will be the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Tannhaeuser" overture, the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods" and the "Ride of the Valkyries." "Wagner nights" are always very popular.

Wednesday brings the first college night of the season—Amherst. This is the third year in which the Amherst alumni and undergraduates have joined in a celebration at the Pops. The Amherst alumni turn out in big numbers, and as Amherst men are famous singers there is always good singing. A number of characteristic Amherst songs will be on the programme.

The annual "Harvard night" is set for Monday week, May 20. As usual the glee club will be in attendance to sing during the intermissions and there will be a big outpouring of Harvard men. Last year "Harvard night" was the biggest of the whole season of the Pops.

The programme for tonight is as follows: March, "The Comet," Strube; overture, "Zampa," Herold; waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; selection, "The Pink Lady," Caryll; Hungarian rhapsody, No. 2, Liszt; "Ave Maria," Schubert, 'cello solo, Mr. J. Keller; "Entree Triomphale des Boyards," Halverson; overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky, organ, Mr. Marshall; overture, "Raymond," Thomas; serenade, Strube; gavotte, Gebhard; waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel; march, "King Karl"

American May 12, 1912

SECOND WEEK OF "POPS."

First of the Season's Wagner Night Comes Tonight.

The second week of the "Pops" opens tomorrow evening with Mr. Strube's first "Wagner night." As is the custom on such occasions he devotes the second part of the program to important Wagner selections and these programs have always had a great attraction for the audience. The four numbers to be played tomorrow night are the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Tannhauser" overture, the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and the Ride of the Valkyries.

The first College Night of the season comes next Wednesday, May 15, when Amherst celebrates. Amherst is very strong in Boston, its alumni are most enthusiastic, and in the two past years the Amherst celebrations have been second in point of attendance and enthusiasm only to the "Harvard Nights." Amherst men are famous singers and they expect to break all records Wednesday night. A number of characteristic Amherst songs will appear on the programme.

The annual "Harvard Night" is set for a week from tomorrow night, Monday, May 20. This is the really big event of the year at the Pop concerts. The Harvard Glee Club will be in attendance and will sing during intermissions. The programme for tomorrow night is as follows:

Coronation March.....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Stradella".....Flotow
Waltz, "Donauweibchen".....Strauss
Selection, "La Traviata".....Verdi

Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Overture, "Tannhauser;" Funeral March, from "The Dusk of the Gods"; Ride of the Valkyries....Wagner

Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Prelude to "The Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Selection, "Gypsy Love".....Lehar
March, "Boston—1915".....Strube

Post-May 14, 1912.

CROWD AT POPS LIKES WAGNER

Serious Programme Warmly Applauded

The programme of the Pop concert last night in Symphony Hall was one of unusual interest, embracing, as it did, four selections from the operas of Wagner, a Strauss waltz, music from Verdi's "La Traviata," Auber's brilliant overture to "Masaniello," Lehar's music from "Gypsy Love" and Strube's rattling march, "1911."

There was again a large and enthusiastic audience, and Mr. Strube was liberal with his extras. He gave excellent performances of the Wagner excerpts, especially the funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung"—music serious indeed for a Pop programme, but harkened to most attentively and warmly applauded afterward—and the picturesque "Ride of the Valkyries." Meyerberg's "Coronation March" opened the programme.

The performance of Auber's overture brought to mind the fact that this overture, with its diminished 7th chords in the opening measures, was a direct slap in the face of the conservatives of the last century. Wagner called the piece a "sans-cullote music," and the opera that followed the overture was as radical and as violent a departure toward realism as was the "Cavalleria Rusticana" of Pietro Mascagni a few years ago. Auber's piece, as it is, is effectively instrumentated, and full of hot blood, in spite of some trivial passages. The composer was first of all a man for the theatre, and he knew well how to write music befitting such conditions. The programme, with its special emphasis upon the music of Wagner, made as considerable appeal as it always does. [illegible]

[204]

Post May 7, 1912

SEASON OF 1912 POPS NOW OPEN

Record Audience at Symphony Hall Enjoys Music

There is certainly no audience in Boston so diverse and so representative of nearly every class of people in the city as the audience that gathers, night in and night out, but especially for the opening night, when the Pop concerts are on in Symphony Hall.

Last night, in spite of the bad weather, the audience for the first Pop concert of 1912 was larger, if anything, on the floor than the same audience last year, and but little smaller in the galleries.

And last year was accounted the most successful in the history of these concerts.

COSMOPOLITAN AUDIENCE

Seated about the tables on the floor you may see the maid and the matron, the fresh young man from college, the business man, the artist, musician, newspaper man, the family group, the party gotten up for the evening, wearing just a few thousand dollars' worth of clothes, the larky and ill-assured youth with his beaming inamorata, the type, or species, slangily known as "actorine" and likewise well upholstered for the occasion, the heavy jowled and the middle aged, the dress suit and the turned-up trousers, more colors than ever graced the coat of Joseph, and more styles than any one continent could furnish in several seasons. An eager and unlovely swain, anchored by his bride-to-be. Even a "high-brow" music critic or two, who, perhaps, has been feeding his winter's spleen on firewater of various strengths, who now have declared temporary truce with artists, managers and public, lolls contendedly in his chair, over a claret lemonade, and calls to his neighbor across tables, "Pretty good for a change, isn't it?"

And so on; women who decide who's who in the social game; men whose names mean things in finance or politics. The list would be endless. The talk is infinite in its variety. There is billing and cooing; even yet, heaven save the mark, musical discussion; milliners are extolled, waiters are threatened, from one side a political argument waxing hot, from the other discussion of the price of beef and summer cottages.

They all sit fairly still while the orchestra plays, and during the intermission some of the musicians come down from the stage and chat with their friends. After the "Rienzi" overture there is a crash of applause. In spite of the conductor's decision to the contrary, the roar continues until he is forced to give in, and the splendid old melody thunders out again. There are trifles light as air, played nearly as lightly, as extras. Handel's piece is followed by a lilting Strauss waltz, and the waltz by a "Pink Lady" selection.

The programme tonight, Gustav Strube conducting, will consist of compositions by Berlioz ("Rakoczy" march), Rossini, Strauss (waltz, "Die Fledermaus"), Burgmein (suite, "Carnaval Venitien"), Bizet (Carmen selections), Tschaikowsky ("Nutcracker Suite"), Wagner (prelude to "Lohengrin"), Herbert (Irish rhapsody), Elgar, Massenet ("Meditation," from appeared shortly after 8 o'clock. As if to start the season in fitting manner, the blare of the brasses was the first response to Conductor Strube's baton in the opening measures of Gounod's "The Queen of Sheba."

Same Strube as of Yore

It was the same Strube of other years who insisted that the audience become quiet for the soft, sweet strains of the opening bars of Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," by rapping smartly and long with his baton. Insistent demand for an encore was graciously met by Mr. Strube.

Softened rolling of the drums opened Komzak's waltz, "The Girls of Baden," and a repitition of its last movement was the encore which Mr. Strube gave this time. In the overture, "Rienzi," by Wagner, following the first intermission, the brasses had their first real innings of the evening, and with the assistance of the wood wind, sent blasts out over the audience that effectively drowned the hum of conversation. The encore was well contrasted with the Wagnerian blasts, for Mr. Strube gave his audience a soft, catchy walze, that evoked as much applause as its predecessor.

The success of Mr. Strube's serenade was not all due to the popularity of its composer, for the stirring of the spectators, evincing an interest in what was to come, was satisfactorily rewarded with the playing of the piece. A solo by Concert-master Jacques Hoffmann and the blending of the strings and wood wind gave a very effective coloring to the short piece. The audience demanded that it be repeated, and it was.

The broad passages of Saint-Saens's "Samson and Delilah," in which every piece in the big orchestra had a share, including solo work by the oboe, harp and bells, and the sudden changes of the inaroduction to Act 3 of "The Jewels of the Madonna," by Wolf-Ferrari, finished the second third of the program.

Organ Is Heard

Following the second intermission came the picturesque and even wild strains of Gomez's overture, "Il Guarany." Not the least of the evening's successes was an extra, an orchestration of sacred music, in which the organ furnished a background. Strauss's waltz, "The Roses From the South," set everybody swaying with its rhythm. A selection from "The Pink Lady" and Schrammel's march, "Hans Richter," ended a program that was worthy the setting of an opening night.

The following program will be played tonight:

March from "Damnation of Faust"....Berlioz
Overture, "The Barber of Seville"....Rossini
Waltz, "Die Fledermaus".....Strauss
Carnaval Venetien.....Burgmein
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Two Movements from "The Nut-Cracker Suite".....Tschaikowsky
(a) Danse de Mirlitons.
(b) Danse Russe Trepak.
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
Organ, Mr. Marshall
Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet
Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffman
Selection, "The Siren".....Fall
March, "Mit Standarten".....Blon

Advertiser May 7, 1912.

THE 27TH SERIES OF POPS OPENS VERY AUSPICIOUS

Gustav Strube Leads a Symph Band—The Customary Sprinkling Fashion in Evidence.

By S. C. Williams.

Spring is tardy, but the "Pops" fo promptly the Symphony season. The series of these concerts, probably the offered in any beer garden the world began in Symphony hall, last night. Gustav Strube conducted and the sprinkling of fashion customary on first nights was in evidence, with as many of hoi polloi as could comfortably gain admission.

The programme was one of the sort proven by long experience to be agreeable to man as he sits and smokes, and tries to sip at his ease. Wagner, Gounod, Delibes, Strauss, and the new comer, Wolf-Ferrari,—mostly excerpts of opera, with an occasional waltz or invigorating march. The band, as heretofore made up of 55 Boston Symphony men, played as if they enjoyed doing so, and thoroughly succeeded in pleasing their auditors. Encores insistently demanded were generously given, and the season opened auspiciously, despite drizzled discouragement from the sky.

It is agreeable to note, from year to year, Pop patrons' increasing grasp of the art of relaxation. Time was when the innocent stranger who pounded a table to signify enthusiasm was regarded as one who has wantonly kicked his grandmother's tomb. Mr. and Mrs. Boston have mellowed since then. The starched shirt no longer stiffens a starched spirit, and ladies of the Back Bay Ghetto sit sociably near the less elect. A genial air prevails.

Tonight this programme will be played:—

1. March from "Damnation of Faust"...Berlioz
2. Overture, "The Barber of Seville"....Rossini
3. Waltz, "Die Fledermaus".....Strauss
4. Carnaval Venetien.....Burgmein
   (a) Florindo.
   (b) Rosaura.
   (c) Colombine.
   (d) Arlequin.
5. Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
6. Two movements from "The Nut-Cracker Suite".....Tschaikowsky
   (a) Danse de Mirlitons.
   (b) Danse Russe Trepak.
7. Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
8. Irish Rhapsody.....Herbert
9. March, "Pomp and Circumstance"....Elgar. Organ, Mr. Marshall.
10. Meditation from "Thais".....Massenet Solo violin, Mr. J. Hoffmann.
11. Selection, "The Siren".....Fall
12. March, "Mit Standarten".....Blon

Journal May 7, 1912.

"POPS" OPEN IN BLAZE OF GLORY

Notable Gathering Fills Symphony Hall and Encores Are Frequent.

Gustav Strube and his band of Symphony players opened the twenty-seventh season of Boston's Pop concerts last evening in Symphony Hall with a flourish. The first-night audience was an enthusiastic one, and Mr. Strube was compelled to lead his players through encore after encore. In fact almost every number on the program was encored, and several of the encores, notably a selection from the "Tales of Hoffmann," created a demand for an encore of the encore which Mr. Strube was obliged to refuse because of the length of the program.

Every table on the floor of the big auditorium was taken, and there were many society notables present with their families and parties of friends. Remembering Conductor Strube's successes in the past, the large audience gave him a hearty welcome when he

Journal May 11, 1912

Wagner and Amherst Nights at the Pops

This evening the following program will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall:

March, "The Comet".....Strube
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Selection, "The Pink Lady".....Caryll
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Liszt
"Ave Maria".....Schubert
'Cello solo, Mr. J. Keller
Entree Triomphale des Boyards.....Halverson
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Raymond".....Thomas
Serenade.....Strube
Gavotte.....Gebhard
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
March, "King Karl".....Unrath

The second week of the Pops opens Monday evening with Mr. Strube's first Wagner night. The first college night of the season comes next Wednesday, when Amherst celebrates. A number of characteristic Amherst songs will appear on the program. Harvard night will come a week from Monday. This is the big event of the year at the Pops. The Harvard Glee Club will sing during intermissions. The program for Monday night is as follows:

Coronation march.....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Stradella".....Flotow
Waltz, "Donauweibchen".....Strauss
Selection, "La Traviata".....Verdi
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Overture, "Tannhauser"
Funeral march, from "The Dusk of the Gods"
Ride of the Valkyries
Wagner
Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Prelude to "The Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Selection, "Gypsy Love".....Lehar
March, "Boston—1915".....Strube

Advertiser May 11, 1912

The Pops.

The first week of the Pops, which ends tonight, shows the expected increase of business over last year, for these concerts in recent years have grown steadily every season. The coming week will have the attraction of two special nights. Monday Mr. Strube has his first "Wagner Night." "Wagner Nights" are always very popular.

Wednesday brings the first college night of the season—Amherst. This is the third year in which the Amherst alumni and undergraduates have joined in a celebration at the Pops.

Traveler, May 11

WAGNER NIGHT AT "POPS" ON MONDAY

THE first week of the Pops, which ends tonight, shows the expected increase of business over last year for these concerts in recent years have grown steadily every season. The coming week will have the attraction of two special nights. Monday Mr. Strube has his first "Wagner night." As those who go to the Pops from year to year know, this does not mean that the whole programme is devoted to Wagner, but he bunches four numbers in the second part. These four numbers will be the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Tannhaeuser" overture, the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods" and the "Ride of the Valkyries." "Wagner nights" are always very popular.

Wednesday brings the first college night of the season—Amherst. This is the third year in which the Amherst alumni and undergraduates have joined in a celebration at the Pops. The Amherst alumni turn out in big numbers, and as Amherst men are famous singers there is always good singing. A number of characteristic Amherst songs will be on the programme.

The annual "Harvard night" is set for Monday week, May 20. As usual the glee club will be in attendance to sing during the intermissions and there will be a big outpouring of Harvard men. Last year "Harvard night" was the biggest of the whole season of the Pops.

The programme for tonight is as follows: March, "The Comet," Strube; overture, "Zampa," Herold; waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; selection, "The Pink Lady," Caryll; Hungarian rhapsody, No. 2, Liszt; "Ave Maria," Schubert, 'cello solo, Mr. J. Keller; "Entree Triomphale des Boyards," Halverson; overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky, organ, Mr. Marshall; overture, "Raymond," Thomas; serenade, Strube; gavotte, Gebhard; waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel; march, "King Karl."

American May 12, 1912

SECOND WEEK OF "POPS."

First of the Season's Wagner Night Comes Tonight.

The second week of the "Pops" opens tomorrow evening with Mr. Strube's first "Wagner night." As is the custom on such occasions he devotes the second part of the program to important Wagner selections and these programs have always had a great attraction for the audience. The four numbers to be played tomorrow night are the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Tannhauser" overture, the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and the Ride of the Valkyries.

The first College Night of the season comes next Wednesday, May 15, when Amherst celebrates. Amherst is very strong in Boston, its alumni are most enthusiastic, and in the two past years the Amherst celebrations have been second in point of attendance and enthusiasm only to the "Harvard Nights." Amherst men are famous singers and they expect to break all records Wednesday night. A number of characteristic Amherst songs will appear on the programme.

The annual "Harvard Night" is set for a week from tomorrow night, Monday, May 20. This is the really big event of the year at the Pop concerts. The Harvard Glee Club will be in attendance and will sing during intermissions. The programme for tomorrow night is as follows:

Coronation March.....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Stradella".....Flotow
Waltz, "Donauweibchen".....Strauss
Selection, "La Traviata".....Verdi

Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Overture, "Tannhauser;" Funeral March, from "The Dusk of the Gods"; Ride of the Valkyries....Wagner

Overture, "Masaniello".....Auber
Prelude to "The Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Selection, "Gypsy Love".....Lehar
March, "Boston—1915".....Strube

Globe, May 13 1912.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Wagner Evening at "The Pops."

New Rival Tenors in London Opera Houses.

Reminiscences of Felicia Lyne's Teacher---Notes.

The second week of the "pops" opens tomorrow with Mr Strube's first "Wagner Night." As is the custom on such occasions, he devotes the second part of the program to important Wagner selections, and these programs have always had a great attraction for the audiences.

The first "College Night" of the season comes next Wednesday, May 15, when Amherst celebrates. Amherst is very strong in Boston, its alumni are most enthusiastic and in the two past years the Amherst celebrations have been second in point of attendance and enthusiasm only to "Harvard Nights." Amherst men are famous singers and a number of characteristic Amherst songs will appear on the program.

The annual "Harvard Night" is set for a week from tomorrow, Monday, May 20. This is the really big event of the year at the "pop" concerts. The Harvard Glee Club will be in attendance and will sing during intermissions. The program for tomorrow night is as follows:

Coronation March.....Meyerbeer
Overture, Stradella.....Flotow
Waltz, Donauweibchen.....Strauss
Selection, La Traviata.....Verdi
Prelude to Lohengrin.....Wagner
Overture, Tannhauser.....Wagner
Funeral March from The Dusk of the Gods
Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Overture, Masaniello.....Auber
Prelude to The Deluge.....Saint-Saens
Selection, Gypsy Love.....Lehar
March, Boston-1915.....Strube

Post-May 14, 1912

CROWD AT POPS LIKES WAGNER

Serious Programme Warmly Applauded

The programme of the Pop concert last night in Symphony Hall was one of unusual interest, embracing, as it did, four selections from the operas of Wagner, a Strauss waltz, music from Verdi's "La Traviata," Auber's brilliant overture to "Masaniello," Lehar's music from "Gypsy Love" and Strube's rattling march, "1911."

There was again a large and enthusiastic audience, and Mr. Strube was liberal with his extras. He gave excellent performances of the Wagner excerpts, especially the funeral music from "Die Gotterdammerung"—music serious indeed for a Pop programme, but harkened to most attentively and warmly applauded afterward—and the picturesque "Ride of the Valkyries." Meyerberg's "Coronation March" opened the programme.

The performance of Auber's overture brought to mind the fact that this overture, with its diminished 7th chords in the opening measures, was a direct slap in the face of the conservatives of the last century. Wagner called the piece a "sans-cullote music," and the opera that followed the overture was as radical and as violent a departure toward realism as was the "Cavalleria Rusticana" of Pietro Mascagni a few years ago. Auber's piece, as it is, is effectively instrumentated, and full of hot blood, in spite of some trivial passages. The composer was first of all a man for the theatre, and he knew well how to write music befitting such conditions. The programme, with its special emphasis upon the music of Wagner, made as considerable appeal as is always the case when

Journal May 14, 1912

"Wagner Night" at The Pop Concerts

Wagnerian music prevailed at the Pops last night, but there were also lighter tunes to please the more popular taste and lend the variety which makes Pop music all around the best of the year. Conductor Strube is an adept at making pleasing programs. This Wagner night was the first of the special events of the brief Pop season. Tomorrow night will come Amherst night. The Amherst boys are famous for their singing. Tonight's program will be as follows:

March, "Merry Soldiers".....Sabathil
Overture, "The Bronze Horse".....Auber
Waltz, "Rain of Gold".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Mikado".....Sullivan
Selection, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Two Entr' Actes from "Carmen".....Bizet
Hungarian Rhapsody, in F.....Liszt
Fire Charm, from "Die Walkure".....Wagner
Overture, "Orpheus".....Offenbach
The Rosary.....Nevin
The Enchanted Hour.....Mouton
Selection, "The Siren".....Fall
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppe

Globe May 21, 1912

HARVARD NIGHT AT "POPS."

Lively Time Enjoyed by Great Audience, With Singing by the Glee Club and Special Stunts.

"The Pops" flourished again last night to the glory of the sons of Harvard, and of the cause of learning. It was a noble sight to see the zealous young collegians grouped about the tables on the floor, deep in their studies, in a flamboyant flower garden of millinery, and in the beverages that have made more than one town famous.

The glee club encamped in the northeast corner of the room and filled both the idle moments and the public ear. During the first recess it uncorked a masterpiece of erudition, pages, reams of egyptology, neurology, Euripides, who knows, wedded to yards of tune, a round-up, brood, platoon, avalanche of this season's classic ragtime hits, spliced, dovetailed, mortised and otherwised spiked together. The stars of the track team in the 440 and the mile finished without turning a hair. A few experienced an obvious touch of the heaves. It was an amazing demonstration of the prowess of the institution as a home of the art of song.

Nor was this the sole exhibition of vocal skill. The ghost of "The Ham Tree" shrunk into a sandwich at the performance of Deane W. Hanscom in "The Barber's Ball," with Frank R. Hancock at the piano. Both these gentlemen hope to be graduated this year if they can escape vaudeville. With the loud mention of Ralph Bunker in "Dixie" with the glee club playing at quarterback and both ends the catalogue of blackface artists is for the present complete.

While the variety show was not improvising in this manner the orchestra was permitted to play. The time-honored memory of the Harvard Musical Association, the parent of all those bodies who eke out a living by playing symphonies, at last came to its just reward. A succession of pieces from some of the young purveyors to the best comic opera trade, kept spirits high and mirth lively. Fletcher ('07), Cheney ('12), Blaikie ('14), Hancock ('12), Clifton ('12), Perley ('12), Davidson ('06) and others saw the crowd warm to their creations in a manner that might have carried a pertinent admonition—for instance, to one Edward Elgar, who, even after having written a first symphony, wrote a second.

Edward Burlingame Hill was represented by a graceful trifle, his "Moth Dance." J. E. Mitchell, '14, displayed a good technic in a Widor toccata, and a march, "Veritas," by Mr Densmore made entire repose by some a difficult thing. Finally Victor Herbert's militant American Fantasy brought the great audience to its feet, applauding and singing in the "Columbia" and the "Star Spangled Banner." The quartet sang and "Fair Harvard" and a march closed a lively program.

[204]

...4, 1912.

...at
...op Concerts
...prevailed at the
... there were also
...e the more popu-
...he variety which
... around the best
...ctor Strube is an
...leasing programs.
...as the first of the
...e brief Pop sea-
...nt will come Am-
Amherst boys are
...inging. Tonight's
...follows:

...Horse"	Sabathil
	Auber
	Waldteufel
	Sullivan
"Carmen"	Leoncavallo
F	Bizet
Walkure"	Liszt
	Wagner
	Offenbach
	Nevin
	Mouton
	Fall
	Suppe

...1, 1912

...HT AT "POPS."

...yed by Great Audi-
...ging by the Glee
... Stunts.

...urished again last
...y of the sons of
...e cause of learning.
...t to see the zealous
... grouped about the
... deep in their studies,
...wer garden of mil-
...beverages that have
...e town famous.
...amped in the north-
...oom and filled both
...nd the public ear.
...cess it uncorked a
...tion, pages, reams
...rology," Euripides,
... to yards of tune,
...platoon, avalanche
...assic ragtime hits,
...ertised and other-
... The stars of
...440 and the mile
...ing a hair. A few
...lous touch of the
...n amazing demon-
...wess of the institu-
...he art of song.
...e sole exhibition of
...host of "The Ham
...a sandwich at the
...ne W. Hanscom in
..." with Frank R.
...piano. Both these
...be graduated this
...escape vaudeville.
...on of Ralph Bunker
...e glee club playing
... both ends the cat-
...e artists is for the
...
... show was not im-
...anner the orchestra
...ay. The time-hon-
...e Harvard Musical
...arent of all those
...a living by playing
... came to its just
...on of pieces from
... purveyors to the
...trade, kept spirits
...ely. Fletcher ('07),
...('14), Hancock ('12),
...('12), Davidson ('06)
...e crowd warm to
... manner that might
...ertinent admonition
...ne Edward Elgar,
...ving written a first
... second.
...ne Hill was repre-
...al trifle, his "Moth
...nell; '14, displayed a
...dor tocoata, and a
... by Mr Densmore
... by some a difficult
...or Herbert's mili-
...ntasy brought the
...ts feet, applauding
...Columbia" and the
...iner." The quartet
...vard" and a march
...am.

Herald - May 21, 1912.

Yes, It Was Harvard Night at the Pop Concert and They Were All There

Scene in Symphony Hall as Harvard Glee Club Sang a Selection on Harvard Night.

Few Missed the Event of the Season at Symphony Hall.

GLEE CLUB MAKES A HIT

"Harvard night at the Pop concerts is always good. Mary and I just know you will enjoy it. They have them every year and you never want to miss one, for all the Harvard men are here and they have such a good time. Haven't you ever been to one before? No? Well I will let you know next year when it is to be given and you really must come down. You know John is a Harvard man—

"John, what is your class?"

"The best."

"Goose. I meant your graduating year."

"John I wish you would tell me who attracts you so much. I asked you a question?"

"That's him all right."

"Who?"

"That surely is Jim. He was in my class. Excuse me a minute; I will be back a little later."

Harvard Men Stick Together.

"Mary, if you ever marry a Harvard man you will find they stick together—" I was going to say just like sweet-hearts—what do men call it? Oh, yes, chums. No, that's not it—well, anyway it's positively awful—there's John now. I wonder who he is talking with? Oh, I suppose one of his old cronies at college—that's it! That's what John calls them, his cronies. Johanna, I do wish you would listen to me, You have had your gaze on that young man for five minutes. Look; there he is looking at you. Johanna, will you listen to me? I say—"

"Well, you got to admit, mamma, that he is a handsome fellow."

"I do wish John was here and I would make him tak to you."

"Isn't that fine? That was 'Soldier's Field,' and look, it was composed by Mr. Fletcher of the class of 1907. Johanna!"

"There's a pretty hat, Mary. See that black English derby with the little French fold of cerise. There; over there; don't you see? that one with the one drooping feather of cerise. I think it looks very stylish. Johanna, I insist that you keep your eyes off that young man."

"Who is that, John, you were talking to?"

"That was Warren Locke. He was for 40 years organist of Appleton chapel at Harvard. He retired a number of years ago and is now organist at St. Paul's."

"Yes, but look, dear, he is with a number of young men."

"Well, my dear, it is nights like this that make old men young. And you could keep Warren Locke away from a Harvard night of music no more than you could keep me at the club when I knew you were waiting—"

"John! John! I do wish you would speak to Johanna. I cannot get her to keep her eyes of that young man there."

"Oh, let her alone. If you remember it was at a Pop concert that we first met. And you know—"

"I wish you had been here when they played the selections from 'The Impostor,' and just think it was composed by Mr. Cheney of '12 and Mr. Blaikie of '14. And that 'Below Zero,' by Mr. Hancock of '12 and Mr. Clinton of '12, was just splendid. Johanna!!!!"

"John were you just as much alive as all these young fellows when you were at Harvard?"

"I hardly think so. If you remember, dear, I was out at your house nearly every evening."

The Nice Linen Dress.

"Mary, isn't that a nice white linen dress. The one with the masses of white eyelet embroidery? I'm glad you like it. And isn't that a pretty girl, there with the little wreath of orange blossoms? Ain't she sweet?"

"Why, look here John, that 'National march' was written by Mr. Perley of '12. I must say it is a splendid tribute to these young men to find the big audience giving such applause. Who is that old man John with the grey beard, where the boys are cheering?"

"Well, upon my word, Old '69 is here again. Never misses one of these concerts. Comes from New York every year. I'll, be——"

"Johanna I must insist that you pay attention to the conventions. You must not act so. I'm going to scold you in a minute. Mary that 'Gondoliera' which was just played was written by Prof. Davison who is now the musical instructor at Harvard. Wasn't it splendid? Johanna I will never take you to another college gathering. There is the Toccata for the organ and they do tell me that Mr. Widor is just 22 years old. Look at John chumming around with those young fellows."

"Oh, here's the glee club.

"Wasn't that fine? And that encore they gave 'I Wish I Was in Dixie.' Mary you must never miss another one of these concerts. Isn't that a stylish gown? That one there, the wistaria of meteor silk. Why it's made in the latest style of the adaptation of the panier. John I do wish you would speak to Johanna; she just said she wished Harvard was a co-ed college and positively she has paid no attention to me this evening.

"Do you hear what your mother says?

They Sing "Fair Harvard."

"Oh they're all standing up. Why it's 'Fair Harvard.' Just think, it was written in 1811 and the men just leap to their feet when it is sung. Johanna!!!

"Aren't they the big crowd of good natured, happy fellows. Oh! here is a quartet.

"That was just splendid. And really 'dried apple pies' are impossible. Well here is the last piece. We better get our wraps on. Johanna you shall not come with me again to a Harvard Pop concert—

"Oh, let her alone, dear; all the boys look good to the girls and all the girls to the boys. You know here is where we first—

"Mary I do hope you enjoyed this evening. Well I am glad of that."

Herald - May 21, 1912.

TUFTS MEN WHOSE SONGS WILL BE SUNG AT "POPS" TONIGHT

Prof. Leo R. Lewis, Head of Tufts Musical Department.

Joseph W. Morton, Tufts '11.

TUFTS NIGHT THIS EVENING AT THE 'POPS'

Alumni and Undergraduates Will Crowd Symphony Hall at Biennial Event.

The seventh observance of the biennial "Tufts night" at the Pop concerts will be held this evening in Symphony Hall, when practically every undergraduate of Tufts and Jackson colleges, together with large representations from the alumni organizations of Massachusetts, will be present. Every seat in the hall has been sold at private sale among Tufts alumni or undergraduates, and it is estimated that 2000 Tufts men or sympathizers will fill the hall.

The baseball team will be special guests, together with the members of the glee and mandolin clubs, who are to furnish part of the entertainment.

The affair is in charge of Prof. Leo R. Lewis, head of the Tufts music department, the author of many Tufts songs, and for many years the coach of the musical clubs. The program will include nine Tufts songs, with "Dear Alma Mater," which was composed by Prof. Lewis as the final number of the program. Another feature will be a medley of Tufts airs, which has been especially arranged for the evening by Joseph W. Morton, '11. "The Sword of Ferrera," composed by the late Frederick Field Bullard, will be given by the combined Tufts Mandolin and Glee clubs, assisted by the Symphony orchestra, and led by Prof. Lewis. President Hamilton of Tufts and Dean Caroline S. Davies of Jackson are to be present. The committee from Tufts in charge of the arrangements for the observance, consists of Prof. Lewis, chairman, David T. Montague, '89, and Instructor Frank E. Seavey.

Journal May 21, 1912.

HARVARD MAKES MERRY AT "POPS"

Crimson-Decked Symphony Hall Rings With College Cheers.

Harvard's annual jollification in Boston took place at Symphony Hall last night. It was Harvard night at the Pops, and never has there been a bigger or better one.

Every seat, with the exception of the few hundred rush seats outside the rail on the floor, had been gone for nearly a week. There was standing room only for the late-comers, and not much of that. Those who wouldn't miss the festivities for anything were glad to squeeze into the doorways, upstairs and down. All around was red—a big, blazing pinkish "Harvard" over the stage, red bannerets hanging over the balcony rails, wonderful red hats, red complexions (as well as pale), red lemonade. Even the exit signs loomed up in the favorite hue, when you could get a glimpse of them through the crowd.

All-Harvard Program

It was almost an all-Harvard program, and to help out Maestro Strube's orchestra came the glee club from across the river, led by Frank Hancock, '12, who would hardly qualify for center rush or first base, but who proved a winner when it came to extracting dulcet strains from the chorus. He was a crackerjack man at the piano, too, as his singing and playing in the ragtime ball song demonstrated.

The "Soldiers Field" march, written by R. K. Fletcher, '07, started the harmonious merrymaking, and before the band was half way through it the young fellows, scattered high and low all over the hall, were singing just as if they were at home. Selections from this year's Pi Eta and Hasty Pudding shows tickled, not only the Harvard enthusiasts, young and old, but the general public assembled to enjoy the fun. Then, for the sake of auld lang syne, there was a classy excerpt from that gem of by-gone college shows, "The Gondoliers," with music by A. T. Davidson, '06, and after the applause came three cheers for Harvard and one for the talented composer of the piece.

Ragtime Heard

A toccata for organ would strike the outsider as being about as appropriate for so jolly an affair as a vesper service, yet J. E. Mitchell, '14, played this solo cleverly as well as courageously, and the crowd clapped to have him come down front and make his bow. After that, just for variety, the band performed Professor E. B. Hill's tricky "Moth Dance," and the glee club, accompanied by piano and organ, gave Bruno Hahn's fine setting of W. E. Henley's stirring "Invictus."

Then more ragtime, which was stopped only to let the orchestra play and the students sing the Densmore march, "Veritas." Here Mr. Strube managed to work in a couple of pieces from the outside world, a tune from Moncton's "Quaker Girl," which is coming to town next season, and Herbert's exhilarating "American Fantasy." "Fair Harvard" and R. G. Morse's modern classic, "Up the Street," gave just the right finishing touch to the jubilation.

The Tufts boys will have their turn at the Pops tonight. This will be the program:

March, "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
March, "Pax et Lux".....F. E. Dow, M. '09
"Brown and Blue".....E. W. Newton, '90
"For Tufts Hurrah".....'87's Class Song
"Around the Rez".....M. N. Dustin, '06
"Aren't You Glad You're a Tufts Man?"
E. W. Newton, '90
"Forward, Tufts!".....L. R. Lewis, '87
"The Sword of Ferrara" (with Glee Club)
Bullard
"Keep Your Eye on Tufts!"..L. C. Powers, '05
Victory Song.....W. W. Rose, '12
Fantasia-Medley on Tufts Airs (first time)
J. M. Morton, '11
a. Campus Song.....Bullard
b. "Dear Alma Mater".....L. R. Lewis, '87
(Organ, Mr. R. W. Francis, '09)
Selection, "The Pink Lady".....Caryll
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
American Fantasy.....Herbert
(Organ, Mr. Marshall)
March, "Stars and Stripes".....Sousa
Orchestration of Tufts numbers by Lewis, '87; Ingalls, '00; Willis, '01; Maxwell, '04; Francis, '09; Lamont, '10; Morton, '11.

Post - May 21, 1912.

HARVARD NIGHT AT THE POPS

Picturesque Performances Amuse Vast Crowd.

There was a bracing atmosphere inside as well as outside of Symphony Hall at the pop concert when the Harvard crowd gathered last night for a good old-fashioned celebration, enjoyed hugely by everybody present, but wholly free from any of the rough-house demonstrations of other days.

There was a lot of picturesque singing and other performances equally

PLENTY OF FEATURES

There was a virtuoso performance on the big organ by J. E. Mitchell, '14, selections from the music for several Harvard entertainments, concerted performances by the glee club, and part songs old and new relating to various sentiments and actions rife at Harvard. Needless to say, there were present a number of old grads who are now big men in the sight of the world as well as in the hearts of their Cambridge successors. There was the good old sign blazing in red letters over the golden pipes of the organ, the red banners hanging from the railings, the various scarlet head gear, neckties, etc., typical of a Harvard gathering, but the celebration, as a whole was not only genuinely festive and funny, it was in good taste, and entertaining from the first moment to the last. Also, there were more of the gentler persuasion present than in many seasons past.

Hancock and Hanscom

Among the special features of the evening were the extraordinary singing of "The Belle of the Barbers' Ball," by Messrs. Frank Hancock, '12, and leader of the Glee Club, at the piano, and P. W. Hanscom, '12. The players carried on a dialogue to split the sides, while Hancock showed that he could play all around Ignace J. Paderewski or Vladimir de Pachmann when it came to the glissando and other effects of a choicely virtuoso nature. This had to be repeated.

The Glee Club, in addition to old and familiar unaccompanied songs, such as the "Rebecca Song" and the Medley which has been so popular of late years, sang Huhn's setting of Henley's Invictus, and a modern version of Dixie Land, and later in the evening a quartet gave further cause for amusement by their four-part singing, unaccompanied, of such verses as "Since Pa' Bought the New Limousine," and "How I Envy Lucky Jim."

The orchestra played lots of Harvard music and the evening came to an end when the audience rose to its feet and sang with all its might, "The Star Spangled Banner" and "Auld Lang Syne," and the people marched out to the strains of Morse's "Up the Street."

[205]

Herald May 22, 1912.

TUFTS NIGHT AT THE POPS

Symphony Hall Draped in Brown and Blue and Thousands Sing Together.

"The Harvard man, Yale too, if you choose, gets papa to cancel his I-O-U's; here's to good old Tufts, the Brown and Blue! Cornell, they yell, and Princeton grunts, but they all fall down when they try to do stunts, here's to good old Tufts, the Brown and Blue! Chicago boasts of an oil-round college, but she can't beat Tufts in dispensing knowledge. The Brown and Blue made a mighty good man of you!"

It was Tufts night at the Pops last night. A table gave way under the strain of a bottle accompaniment to the chorus of "Keep your eye on Tufts" and a damp policeman came in to do it.

It is wonderful what effects can be got from the word Tufts when it is spelt letter by letter in three tempos, piano, presto and molto accelerato, with as much hurrahing as you please in between.

Brown and blue, colors which Tufts has chosen for its own, were very much in evidence. They winked and blinked from a monster device arranged against the gilded pipes of the big organ at the end of the hall, hung, woven in banners along the galleries where the girls of Jackson College sat apart, but not at all aloof, and were repeated in the floral decorations at the professors' tables. Brown fezzes with blue tassels were worn, too, by a number of hilarious seniors, and care was taken before the end of the evening to see that the biggest heads wore the smallest caps.

The musical program was distinctly Tuftian in character. It was made up, with the exception of the inevitable "Merry Widow" selection, of college songs, sung in lusty concert by about a thousand pairs of young and still young lungs. The Tufts Glee Club, however, has a New England reputation and its perfect training was apparent in two numbers, "The Barnum Song" and the "Sword of Ferrara."

One thing that was remarkable last night was the effect of efficient orchestration on simple airs. As played by the big orchestra, some of the college songs sounded like operatic music.

The program for this evening:

March, "Chantecler" ..... Strube
Overture, "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
Valse Lyrique ..... Emery
Selection, "La Traviata" ..... Verdi
Four Movements from Suite "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Reverie ..... Hopekirk
Selection, "The Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
Intro. to Act 3, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Zampa" ..... Herold
Waltz, "Les Patineurs" ..... Waldteufel
Selection, "The Fortune Teller" ..... Herbert
March, "Professor T" ..... Goldstein

Post, May 22, 1912

TUFTS NIGHT AT THE POPS

Tufts and Jackson students held forth at the Pops last night. The hall was packed in spite of a thunderstorm that raged without, and great was the joy thereof. The Glee Club was in evidence, and so was Professor Leo Lewis, head of the music department, authoritative and enthusiastic as ever, at the baton. He had composed a lot of the music himself and a number of his pupils at Tufts had composed other well known songs on the programme. Whenever Tufts gathers at the Pop concerts it brings a lot of songs with it, and whenever Tufts students sing these songs, they are easily heard.

Not many colleges can furnish such a full list: March, "Pax et Lux," by F. E. Dow, M., '09; "Brown and Blue," E. W. Newton, '90; "For Tufts Hurrah, '87's Class Song"; "Around the Rez." M. N. Dustin, '06; "Aren't You Glad You're a Tufts Man," E. W. Newton, '90; "Forward, Tufts," Leo R. Lewis, '87; "The Sword of Ferrara" (with glee club). Bullard; "Keep Your Eye on Tufts," L. C. Powers, '06; "Victory Song," W. W. Rose, '12; Fantasie-Medley on Tufts Airs, J. W. Morton, '11; Campus Song, Bullard; "Dear Alma Mater" (organ, R. W. Francis, '09), Leo R. Lewis. There were other orchestral numbers appropriate to the occasion, including Herbert's popular American Fantasy.

The Tufts songs had lots of variety and plenty of effect. In the midst of Newton's song the gathering present, thinking to demonstrate their joy in being Tufts men, howled for nearly five full minutes, at the instigation of Professor Lewis, unashamed, on the platform. There were all manner of cries, howls, cat-calls. The song "Keep Your Eye on Tufts" was given with the famous punctuation of hundreds of bottles, and like implements banged on the tables—a roar that drowned out the cracking thunder outside. The number "Dear Alma Mater" was sung with reverent spirit by the large gathering, who presented an impressive spectacle when they rose, as they did a number of times during the evening, en masse floor and balconies.

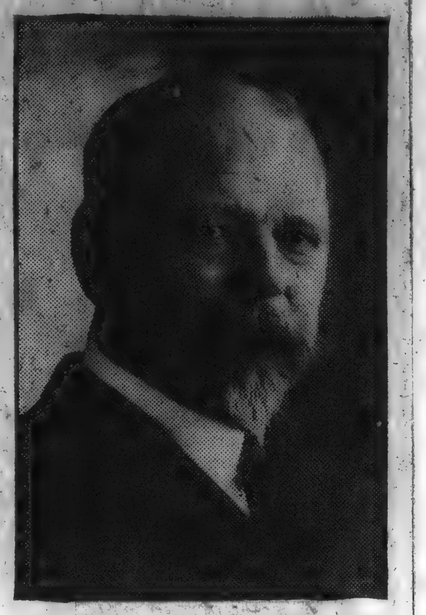
The hall was decorated prominently with the Tufts colors, and there were Tufts cheers for every notable present, from Professor Lewis down. The hall had been entirely sold out to the Tufts and Jackson factions; the baseball team, with the glee and the mandolin clubs, were especial guests of the occasion. President Hamilton of Tufts and Dean Caroline S. Davies of Jackson were present.

Globe, May 22, 1912.

TUFTS STUDENTS MERRY AT POPS

Glee Club Is Heard From Platform—Prof Lewis Leads Orchestra—Jackson Girls Sing.

FERDINAND BRIGHAM, '12.



PROF LEO R. LEWIS.

TWO WHO TOOK PROMINENT PART AT TUFTS NIGHT AT THE POPS.

The seventh annual Tufts night at the Pops was celebrated last evening in Symphony Hall by a large and demonstrative gathering of students, old and young.

The entire undergraduate body, augmented by at least 100 alumni with their guests, occupied the floor and both balconies were filled to their capacity with alumni and friends.

Jackson College was represented in its entirety on the right half of the first balcony, with Dean Caroline S. Davies as their chaperone.

Under the leadership of cheer leaders Brigham '12 and Tosi '12, the students voiced their appreciation on every possible occasion. Leader Stube was greeted with a "regular" Tufts cheer at his appearance on the stage, and cheers for the Symphony Orchestra immediately followed. The entrance of Prof Leo R. Lewis to lead the orchestra for "Pax et Lux," the first Tufts number on the program, was the signal for a prolonged ovation. Prof Lewis led all the Tufts numbers.

The Tufts Varsity baseball team and the College Glee and Mandolin Clubs were the guests of the evening. The feature of the program was Bullard's "The Sword of Ferrara," with the Glee Club, led by Ferdinand Brigham, '12, singing from the stage. C. E. Watkins, '04, sung the solo. The medley on Tufts' airs provided the novelty of the evening. This orchestration of Tufts' most popular songs received its first rendition last night. Joseph W. Morton, '11, the composer of the number, was finally forced to make a short speech of acknowledgment from the balcony rail.

"Loyalty," the pioneer Jackson College song, was blended into the medley, and at the first strains of the chorus the Jackson girls in the balcony arose en masse and sang the words. This appealed to the Tufts youths and they gave their one-time coed sisters a hearty cheer.

Post, May 22, 1912

TONIGHT'S PROGRAMME AT POP CONCERT

Patrons of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall interested in German night are requested to note that it will be Thursday of this week instead of Wednesday as heretofore erroneously announced. The programme for this evening (Wednesday) is as follows:

March, "Chantecler," Strube; Overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber; Valse Lyrique, Emery; Selection, "La Traviata," Verdi; Four Movements from Suite "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Reverie, Hopekirk; Selection, "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Introduction to Act 3, "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari; Overture, "Zampa," Herold; Waltz, "Les Patineurs," Waldteufel; Selection, "The Fortune Teller," Herbert; March, "Professor T," Goldstein.

Journal June 4

Maquarre Becomes Conductor of "Pops"

Mr. Maquarre took his place as conductor at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall last night, succeeding Mr. Strube. The popular and talented young Frenchman, who is one of the leading members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was well received and he provided a very enteraining program.

Tonight being "Tech night" at the Pops, there is no accommodation for the general public. Tomorrow night (Wednesday) will be Williams College night. The program for tonight is as follows:

Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
March, "El Capitan" ..... Sousa
"Dear Old M. I. T." ..... H. S. Wonson, '07
Selection, "The Pink Lady" ..... Caryll
"Fete Boheme" ..... Massenet
Overture, "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "Endymion" ..... Maquarre
"Stein Song" ..... Bullard, '87
Selection, "The Prince of Pilsen" ..... Luders
Selection, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
March, "Up the Street" ..... Morse
"Take Me Back to Tech" ..... Litchfield, '85
"American Fantasy" ..... Herbert

Post June, 4, 1912.

MAQUARRE AS POP LEADER

Interests Big Audience by His Zeal

Andre Maquarre conducted last night at the opening of the fifth week of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The programme was of uncommon interest, containing several novelties, and whether the music were new or old, Mr. Maquarre made it interesting to his hearers by his zeal and his knowledge of orchestral effects.

Among the numbers which found especial favor with the audience were Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz, Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture; Chabrier's superb fantasy on well known Spanish dance tunes, "Espana," Mr. Maquarre's waltz, "Endymion," and a new suite by Christian Kriens, a Dutch composer now resident in New York city, and active there as a violinist and composer, "In Holland." This suite gave pleasure by its simple and tuneful character.

Another feature of the evening was the performance of Massenet's Reverie, "Eve," for strings and organ. This was encored, as were several of the numbers on the programme.

William Krafft, the concert master, was soloist. The audience was large. This evening there will be a special programme in honor of Tech night at the Pops. The floor and balconies have been disposed of to the Institute of Technology and its friends. Wednesday night will be Williams night, and a large delegation of students from that institution will attend.

Journal

TECH CELEBRATES AT POP CONCERTS

Symphony Hall Rings With Cheers of Students and Friends.

Tech wound up its gala day with a blaze of colors and a pandemonium of cheers at the Pop concert last night.

Tech night is one of the few occasions when the Pop precincts are absolutely closed to the general public. Those who shout for the Red and Gray bought out the whole house and made merry, along with their friends. The more active men were clustered around bannerets at the tables on the floor. In the balcony it looked like a ladies' night.

The festivities began with the formal acceptance of the graduating class and the presentation of the class banner. The president of the alumni, J. W. Rollins, took a prominent part, and he was enthusiastically assisted by George B. Glidden, chairman of the concert committee. Tech songs, including Wonson's "Dear Old M. I. T.;" Bullard's fine "Stein Song," and Litchfield's "Take Me Back to Tech," were welcome features. The lamented Bullard was a member of the class of '87, which is celebrating its quarter centennial this year. The class of '97 was also numerously represented.

The cheering and singing were almost continuous, but between times Conductor Maquarre managed to squeeze in some delectable excerpts from the jolly music of the outside world.

[206]

Herald-June 5, 1912

Mysterious Mr. sMITh Attends Tech Reunion at Pop Concert

Technology Float at Symphony Hall, Representing What Has Been Done During Year—Mysterious Mr. Smith Is in Black.

Big Float Is Drawn Through Cheering Throng at Symphony Hall.

MRS. ROGERS REMEMBERED

Technology was out in full force at the Pops last night up to the regular standard of enthusiastic reunions. From 1868 to 1912, the classes got together to revive old friendships.

To symbolize the work of last year, which has been such a rapid changing kaleidoscope of announcements from President Maclaurin's office, Prof. Harry W. Gardner had arranged a large float. After the conclusion of the Stein song by Bullard, '87, the float was drawn down Symphony Hall by 22 1912 men.

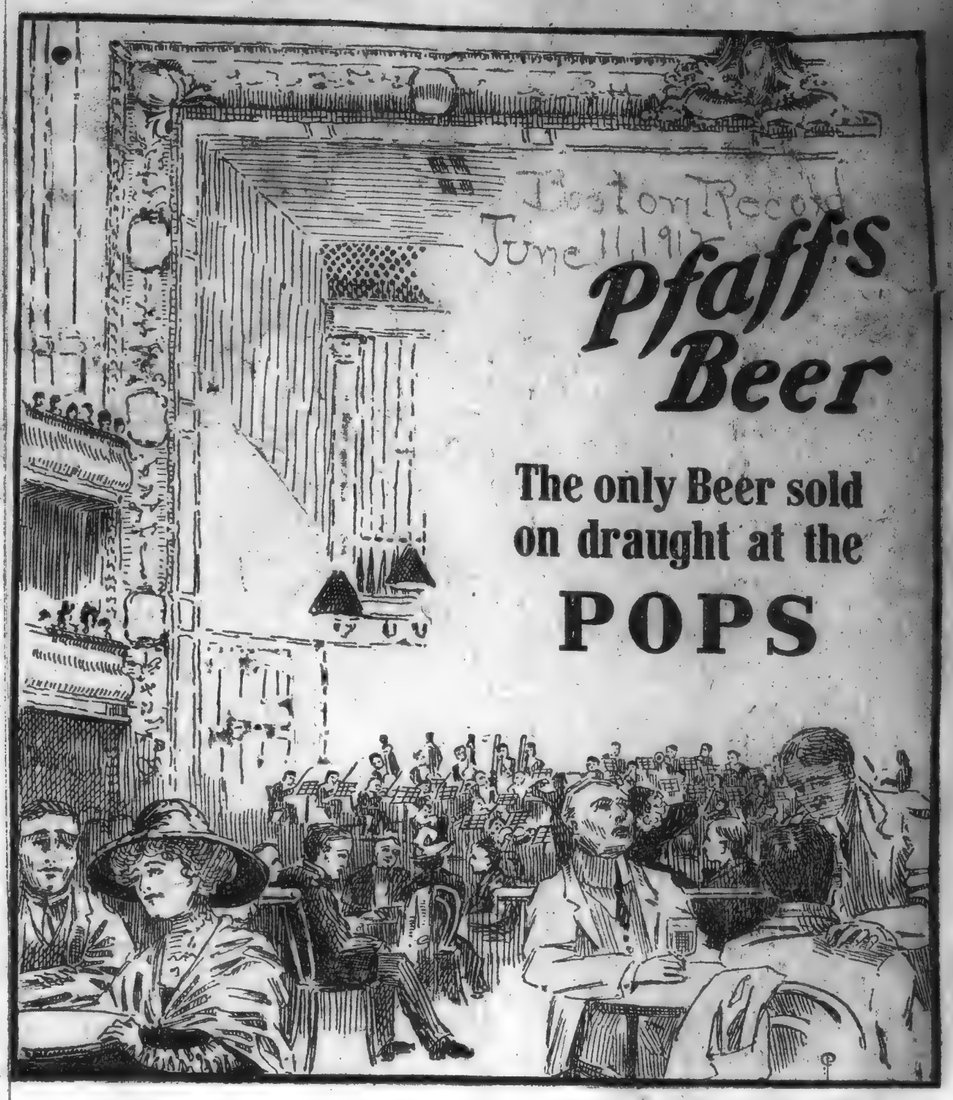
Sitting on the throne was the mysterious "Mr. sMITh" donor of the $2,500,000. On either side were represented Mr. Greene and Mr. du Pont. At the back of the float were Pratt and an Indian symbolic of the state of Massachusetts. In front sat a youth, the Alumni fund, still to grow.

All the characters of the float were taken by seniors who received their degrees in the afternoon. Kenneth C. Robinson of Roslindale was the mysterious Mr. Smith. He explained how, in conjunction with the other recent Technology benefactors, he had made it possible for the equipment to be brought together for the New Technology in Cambridge.

He then introduced the Alumni fund as the vigorous fledgling that was soon to come forward with the endowment for the running of the school. Then Everett B. Wettengel of Fulton, N. Y., as the budding Alumni fund scattered five-year pledge cards among the cheering Tech students and graduates as the float swept majestically out of the hall.

For Mrs. Rogers, wife of the foundor of the school, who had always taken such an active interest in the gatherings of the alumni until her death a year ago, a wreath was as a canopy for the whole.

"Ike" Litchfield, 1885's, "Take Me Back to Tech," sung to the tune of "Solomon Levi," was the enthusiastic wind-up of Technology's yearly "spree."



Boston Record June 11, 1912

Pfaff's Beer

The only Beer sold on draught at the POPS

Herald-June 9, 1912

POPS AND BOSTON TEMPERAMENT

PERHAPS it's because of the general lightness of the season. Perhaps it's because Bostonians like to mingle light music with light beverages, with light refreshments, with light raiment, with a little levity of temperament and a goodly dash of lightness of heart. Perhaps that is the reason why the Pops have become—the plural is taken by right of eminent domain—an institution peculiarly of Boston and have withstood the vagaries of 27 changing years. They can't seem to make Pops go in other cities. They have tried it and failed.

In the eight weeks of the season some 50,000 men and women, old and young and neither old nor young, divert themselves at Symphony Hall, affording just 50,000 possible explanations. Hundreds go to sit and sip, to smoke a cigarette or dally with an ice about the tables on the floor, making a colorful scene of pleasant frivolity. More, in fact a great many more, climb the stairs to the balcony and get an enjoyment not less keen for a modest 25 cents. Is the thing that draws the first group the same that draws the second? Possibly not—but then there are no groups in real popularity. Somebody said that the Pops are the union of tastes, no squint at the gustatory feature being intended.

Of course, there could be no Pops without music. It is even maintained that there could be none without the best of music. It is admitted that the Boston Symphony orchestra has had as much to do as any other single element in contributing to the popularity, but other excellent orchestras in other cities have tried to further the Pops idea without success. Music is essential, to be sure, but it is music and other things that have held Boston for so long a period.

It is a curious manifestation of human whimsicality that even music should be swayed to a degree by the caprice of the weather, but it is a fact that Bostonians refuse to sit through a symphony concert no matter how attractive once the spring has flown. This is not asserted as a matter of guesswork, but has been proved by experience.

At the outset when the Pops had their beginning Mr. Gericke believed he could hold his audiences and his orchestra together after the regular season had closed. In these first Pops there was little difference from the winter program except, perhaps, that there were fewer symphonies. The customary winter rows of seats remained and there was little to mark the experiment as distinctive. It seemed as if the concerts must be abandoned.

Then the idea was evolved of taking out the seats, substituting tables, serving refreshments and furnishing the first of the really light programs. That was in the old Music Hall, and from that time the public has shown an increasnig appreciation.

For all the chanage, however, music has remained the telling feature. People go to the Pops to hear the sort of music they like and they know very definitely what they like. Of the 30,000 or more who go night after night to the balcony the great majority are music lovers. The management has come to know this from the medium of its correspondence. Never a day passes without its grist of requests for selections, and patrons watch the programs for days in advance for some favorite. That they are jealous of their rights is evidenced by what happens when it is found necessary to alter in even one detail the announced group of selections. As sure as one number is changed, so sure is it that the next morning's mail will bring its half-dozen of disappointed protests.

Habitues of the Pops have this in common with many other audiences, that they like the old and familiar numbers best. They will listen with pleasure to the overture of William Tell or Tannhauser, to the selections from light operas which have never been seen by most of the present generation, but which are well known, but they hesitate to commend the newer compositions, and it takes a number of renderings before a new piece gains even a measure of popularity.

Of the lighter music only one sort is absolutely barred. That is rag time. There has never been any rag time at the Pops unless it has crept in in some selection from one of the comic operas. The lack has never been felt by Pop-goers, they are satisfied to leave it to others and have never clamored for its admission.

Among the "other things" which have made the Pops atmosphere perhaps the most attractive is the refreshment feature and the freedom from stiffness and restraint which it promotes. Odd enough, though, the management will tell you that folks do not go to drink and eat, but because they may either eat or drink if they want to. Nor do they go because the men of the party desire to smoke, but because the men may smoke if they so desire.

There are those who assert that it would be impossible to attract so many to the Pops if nothing but "soft" drinks were served, but for all that the fact remains that Bostonians at the Pops drink more temperance beverages than anything else. It may be a matter of surprise to some that ginger ale, grape juice and lemonade are consumed in by far the greatest quantities and that the wicked little rainbow-hued tipples are taboo. Probably the matter of perversity of human wishes enters here again. Can there be any doubt that a man will take to a temperance beverage more kindly if he knows that he can get something else if the whim should seize him? He has no need to assert his independence of the white ribbon when the independence lies close at hand.

Still even if the devotee of the Pops eschews grape juice and other mild allurements he has no substitute which need cause the nods or whispers of his solicitous friends, for only the lighter wines and beers are provided. There is nothing at hand but comparative degrees of softness. The really hard liquors are barred with the rag-time. Whiskey, gin, the highball, the cocktail and all their families and dependants together with the champagnes and other heady wines are rigidly excluded—and with them trouble.

And the Pops appetite? That is a thing which scarcely exists. Long experience has shown that eating to the accompaniment of music, real music, is more of a continental than an American accomplishment. Those who attend the Pops eat apparently rather absently and with no mark of an especial purpose. It would seem that they nibble a sandwich or amuse themselves with an ice chiefly to be in keeping with their surroundings. To sit at a table and do nothing is somehow inappropriate.

There has never been any call for anything substantial in edibles. Salade were introduced for a while, but did not seem to fill any need and were abandoned. Only the sandwiches, the ices and cakes have survived. There is, however, something to eat if one cares to eat and that is an attraction. Not more than 30 or 40 per cent. of those who take seats on the floor either eat or drink.

When the concerts were given first a quarter of a century ago, summer attractions were few, and this fact did much to build up a following. Within the city even at present the Pops are a between-season attraction and that accounts in a measure for their popularity. Bostonians in the past 27 years have been trained to like the Pops idea and it has become a part of the early summer list of diversions. The matter of price, too, has had its weight, and there are a large number of people who drop in at least two or three nights a week. There are many familiar faces and many habitues who have been so regular in their patronage that they know the first names of the waiters. The latter, too, have developed something of the stability of the institution, for several have been identified with the Pops during all the 27 years and nearly all have served for a decade.

Since Music Hall was abandoned for Symphony Hall in 1901, an almost entirely new type of audience has grown up and as it has waxed in size has changed in character. At the outset there was a predominance of the more fashionable following of the Symphony concerts, but of late years, while the fashionables are still to be seen, they are lost in an audience drawn from all walks and stations.

The most striking change has been noted in the increase of attendance in the balconies. Each year shows an added number and it is now estimated that in the eight weeks of the season not less than 33,000 occupy seats in that part of the house. To these, it would seem, the music must be the chief attraction, yet it is pointed out that the other features contribute and that it is still the combination of the music with the "other things" which draws the balcony crowds, though they do not take an active part in life on the "floor."

The Pops were not the product of a Boston idea, but they have been adopted by the city as something which suits the temperament.

[207]

JOYOUS HARVARD CROWDS AT THE POPS

Reunion Classes Guests of Boston Clubs---Cheering and Singing Make Symphony Hall Ring.

The Harvard Club of Boston and its guests, who included all Harvard men visiting Boston for Commencement week, were in full possession of Symphony Hall last evening, and the smoker, concert and vaudeville—it was really a little of everything—held in their honor proved a fitting climax to the celebrations in which the classes of '03, '06, '02, '97, '92 and '87 have been indulging for the past four days.

The hall was given over to the college men. Across the front of the organ the word "Harvard" blazed in large crimson letters and from both balconies were suspended numerous crimson banners inscribed with the words "Pops, Harvard Club, June 20."

Special sections were reserved for the celebrating classes, a large placard on each table indicating where the classes were to group themselves.

The first excitement was the entrance of '06 and '09. Headed by a band they had marched from Copley sq by the way of Dartmouth st, Commonwealth and Massachusetts avs. Nearly all the other classes were already assembled.

The green and white striped "blazers" of '09 were again in evidence, while the '06 men wore their dark green coats adorned with a single white stripe.

William S. Hall, '69, under whose direction the program was given, started the noise by calling for a cheer for the class of '62, which graduated half a century ago. This was given with great enthusiasm. Individual cheers for '62 were given by the various celebrating classes. Each body of men cheered for each of the others, and each returned the compliment.

Even Christopher Columbus, who, as Mr Hall announced, discovered America just 400 years before America discovered the class of 1892, came in for his share of the cheering. In the enthusiasm the crew was not forgotten.

The history of the Harvard Club of Boston "From Its Cradle to Herrick's Lot," meaning the site at Commonwealth and Massachusetts avs which has been selected for the new clubhouse, was presented by its president, Odin Roberts, '86. He illustrated his remarks with lantern pictures, showing the plans for the clubhouse.

The "wholesale department," as designed by A. J. Garceau, '91, proved one of the most interesting of the sketches. Mr Roberts announced that the club was incorporated yesterday, and gave a scedule of the proposed membership fees.

Features of the musical program, the greater part of which was supplied by the Symphony Orchestra players, under the leadership of Andre Maquarre, were: "The Barber's Ball," an amusing duet sung by Dean W. Hanscom and Frank R. Hancock, of the class of '12; "Jack Harvard," by the class of '09, and the alumni chorus. The music of this latter song is by Philip Greeley Clapp, '09, and the words by Harold Everett Porter, '09.

The alumni chorus and the orchestra together, led by Warren A. Locke, '69, gave selections, including "Fair Harvard Forever," written by J. A. Carpenter, '97, and Reichardt's "Image of the Rose," during which Hill, '97, sang a solo.

The gathering broke up with the singing of "Fair Harvard." A crowd of '09 men, determined to continue the celebration a while longer, marched down Huntington av to the Hotel Westminster, bearing the huge 1909 banner and keeping up the singing and cheering with great success.

Smaller groups of men from various classes gathered at hotels after the concert and the interchange of cheers could be heard in the back [illegible] an hour or two after Symphony Hall was deserted.

REQUEST MUSIC AT POPS

Program for Tonight Is Made up of Favorites.

Tonight brings the annual Request program at the Pop concert. The number of requests for pieces this year has been unusually large. The program:

March, "Les Etudiants" ..... Ganne
Overture, "Poet and Peasant" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Fideles Wien" ..... Ziehrer
Selection, "The Pink Lady" ..... Caryll
Prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin" .. Wagner
(a) Largo—Violin, Mr. Krafft; harp, Mr. Schuecker; organ, Mr. Marshall.
(b) Organ solo, Mr. Marshall.
Ballet Music, "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ... Elgar
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
(a) Reverie ..... Hopekirk
(b) Gavotte ..... Gebhard
Waltz, "Barcarolle" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio" ..... Suppe

Transcript - April 15, 1907.

Items of the Day

Three of the oldest members of the Symphony Orchestra have handed their resignations to the management to take effect at the end of the present season: Mr. Sautet, the player of the oboe and and the English horn, who joined the band in Mr. Gericke's first term; Mr. Fox, the veteran flute player; and Mr. Schumann of the octet of horns, who was one of the original members of the orchestra.

MUSICAL AMERICA

Dear MUSICAL AMERICA:

Carl Muck is not being left in doubt as to his international popularity these days. Loyal Bostonians are patting each other on the back in mutual felicitation over his return next season to charge himself with their petted and pampered orchestra, while in Berlin, on the other hand, there are a number going about just now with their spirits clothed in sackcloth and ashes at the thought that the Royal Opera is losing him.

In the latter instance, though, melancholy appears to be mingled with resentment and torrents of molten wrath are being poured on the devoted head of the Royal Opera intendant, Hülsen, who seems to have put his foot into it badly by forgetting that a quasi-military despotism isn't always congenial to the best interests of art. Even the statesmen have gotten themselves worked up over it and I rather chuckled when you informed me last week that the whole affair "was the subject of a spirited debate in the Prussian House of Representatives."

Think of it, picture it to yourself if you can!

And then ask yourself what you would think the world was coming to if one of our government officials were to stand up in our House of Representatives some day and work himself into a fine frenzy over the artistic management of the Metropolitan or the Chicago Opera Companies or over the possibility of the resignation of some distinguished conductor from one of our symphony orchestras!

Sounds almost Gilbertian in its ideal topsy-turviness, doesn't it? Of course, many things are possible in this world, and who can tell but that some day in the coming bye-and-bye Senator So-and-So may be overcome with grief at the thought that the great American conductor X. has resigned from the Philharmonic or the Boston Symphony, to take charge of an orchestra in London, Berlin, Leipsic or Vienna.

Who knows!

But in Germany, you see, a deep concern in artistic affairs is not yet regarded as incompatible with the dignity or efficiency of a politician.

What amazed me particularly was that the Berliners did not fall on America tooth and nail and lay the blame for Muck's departure on American dollars. One paper tried it, it appears, but was indignantly "sat upon" for its pains. Here is truly something to marvel at! America becomes the recipient of a valuable piece of German artistic property and the Germans do not rise in a concerted effort to vent their scorn and contempt upon us. How account for a phenomenon so completely out of accord with all precedent?

"The imputation that Dr. Muck is leaving his distinguished position in Berlin," said the statesman in his speech, "because of an offer of a few thousand marks more is shattered on the rock-bound character of a musician who has fought so honorably, so unselfishly for his artistic aims."

Aha! that tells the tale! So don't comfort yourself with the thought that America was spared a scolding because Germans have suddenly come to respect it artistically more than they have hitherto been doing!

* * *

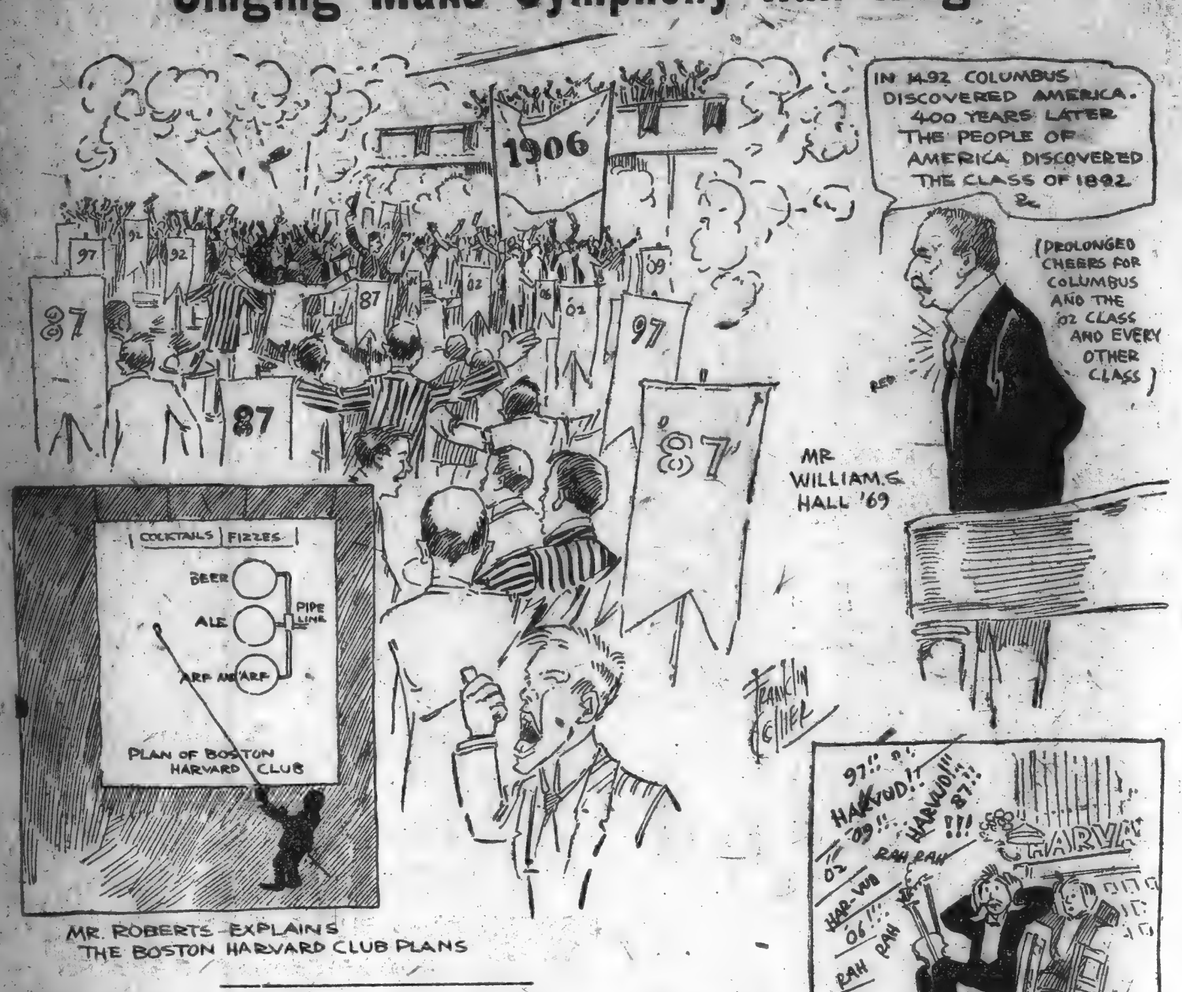
Intendant Hülsen gets the chief blame. It almost seems as though the name of Hülsen were synonymous with foolish policy. It was a Hülsen, you'll recollect, who worked like a Trojan for years to keep Wagner's operas out of the Berlin Royal Opera and who tried to practice his bureaucratic domination on Wagner when he found he could not oppose him in any other way.

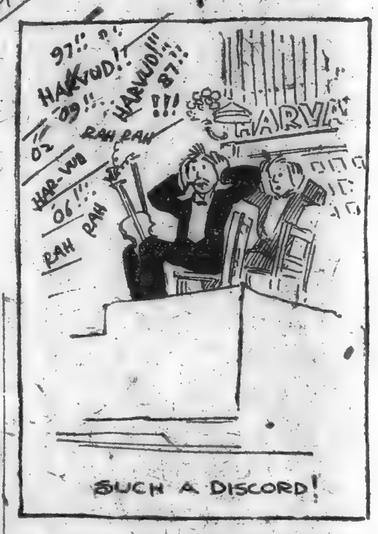
6

[208]

JOYOUS HARVARD CROWDS AT THE POPS

Reunion Classes Guests of Boston Clubs---Cheering and Singing Make Symphony Hall Ring.





The Harvard Club of Boston and its guests, who included all Harvard men visiting Boston for Commencement week, were in full possession of Symphony Hall last evening, and the smoker, concert and vaudeville—it was really a little of everything—held in their honor proved a fitting climax to the celebrations in which the classes of '09, '06, '02, '97, '92 and '87 have been indulging for the past four days.

The hall was given over to the college men. Across the front of the organ the word "Harvard" blazed in large crimson letters and from both balconies were suspended numerous crimson banners inscribed with the words "Pops, Harvard Club, June 20."

Special sections were reserved for the celebrating classes, a large placard on each table indicating where the classes were to group themselves.

The first excitement was the entrance of '06 and '09. Headed by a band they had marched from Copley sq by the way of Dartmouth st, Commonwealth and Massachusetts avs. Nearly all the other classes were already assembled.

The green and white striped "blazers" of '09 were again in evidence, while the '06 men wore their dark green coats adorned with a single white stripe.

William S. Hall, '69, under whose direction the program was given, started the noise by calling for a cheer for the class of '62, which graduated half a century ago. This was given with great enthusiasm. Individual cheers for '62 were given by the various celebrating classes. Each body of men cheered for each of the others, and each returned the compliment.

Even Christopher Columbus, who, as Mr Hall announced, discovered America just 400 years before America discovered the class of 1892, came in for his share of the cheering. In the enthusiasm the crew was not forgotten.

The history of the Harvard Club of Boston "From Its Cradle to Herrick's Lot," meaning the site at Commonwealth and Massachusetts avs which has been selected for the new clubhouse, was presented by its president, Odin Roberts, '86. He illustrated his remarks with lantern pictures, showing the plans for the clubhouse.

The "wholesale department," as designed by A. J. Garceau, '91, proved one of the most interesting of the sketches. Mr Roberts announced that the club was incorporated yesterday, and gave a scedule of the proposed membership fees.

Features of the musical program, the greater part of which was supplied by the Symphony Orchestra players, under the leadership of Andre Maquarre, were: "The Barber's Ball," an amusing duet sung by Dean W. Hanscom and Frank R. Hancock, of the class of '12; "Jack Harvard," by the class of '09, and the alumni chorus. The music of this latter song is by Philip Greeley Clapp, '09, and the words by Harold Everett Porter, '09.

The alumni chorus and the orchestra together, led by Warren A. Locke, '69, gave selections, including "Fair Harvard Forever," written by J. A. Carpenter, '97, and Reichardt's "Image of the Rose," during which Hill, '97, sang a solo.

The gathering broke up with the singing of "Fair Harvard." A crowd of '09 men, determined to continue the celebration a while longer, marched down Huntington av to the Hotel Westminster, bearing the huge 1909 banner and keeping up the singing and cheering with great success.

Smaller groups of men from various classes gathered at hotels after the concert and the interchange of cheers could be heard in the Back Bay for an hour or two after Symphony Hall was deserted.

REQUEST MUSIC AT POPS

Program for Tonight Is Made up of Favorites.

Tonight brings the annual Request program at the Pop concert. The number of requests for pieces this year has been unusually large. The program:

March, "Les Etudiants".....Ganne
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Waltz, "Fideles Wien".....Ziehrer
Selection, "The Pink Lady".....Caryll
Prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin"...Wagner
(a) Largo—Violin, Mr. Krafft; harp, Mr. Schuecker; organ, Mr. Marshall.
(b) Organ solo, Mr. Marshall.
Ballet Music, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
March, "Pomp and Circumstance"...Elgar
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
(a) Reverie.....Hopekirk
(b) Gavotte.....Gebhard
Waltz, "Barcarolle".....Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppe

Transcript - April 15, 1912.

Items of the Day

Three of the oldest members of the Symphony Orchestra have handed their resignations to the management to take effect at the end of the present season: Mr. Sautet, the player of the oboe and and the English horn, who joined the band in Mr. Gericke's first term; Mr. Fox, the veteran flute player; and Mr. Schumann of the octet of horns, who was one of the original members of the orchestra.

MUSICAL AMERICA

Dear MUSICAL AMERICA:

Carl Muck is not being left in doubt as to his international popularity these days. Loyal Bostonians are patting each other on the back in mutual felicitation over his return next season to charge himself with their petted and pampered orchestra, while in Berlin, on the other hand, there are a number going about just now with their spirits clothed in sackcloth and ashes at the thought that the Royal Opera is losing him.

In the latter instance, though, melancholy appears to be mingled with resentment and torrents of molten wrath are being poured on the devoted head of the Royal Opera intendant, Hülsen, who seems to have put his foot into it badly by forgetting that a quasi-military despotism isn't always congenial to the best interests of art. Even the statesmen have gotten themselves worked up over it and I rather chuckled when you informed me last week that the whole affair "was the subject of a spirited debate in the Prussian House of Representatives."

Think of it, picture it to yourself if you can!

And then ask yourself what you would think the world was coming to if one of our government officials were to stand up in our House of Representatives some day and work himself into a fine frenzy over the artistic management of the Metropolitan or the Chicago Opera Companies or over the possibility of the resignation of some distinguished conductor from one of our symphony orchestras!

Sounds almost Gilbertian in its ideal topsy-turviness, doesn't it? Of course, many things are possible in this world, and who can tell but that some day in the coming bye-and-bye Senator So-and-So may be overcome with grief at the thought that the great American conductor X. has resigned from the Philharmonic or the Boston Symphony, to take charge of an orchestra in London, Berlin, Leipsic or Vienna.

Who knows!

But in Germany, you see, a deep concern in artistic affairs is not yet regarded as incompatible with the dignity or efficiency of a politician.

What amazed me particularly was that the Berliners did not fall on America tooth and nail and lay the blame for Muck's departure on American dollars. One paper tried it, it appears, but was indignantly "sat upon" for its pains. Here is truly something to marvel at! America becomes the recipient of a valuable piece of German artistic property and the Germans do not rise in a concerted effort to vent their scorn and contempt upon us. How account for a phenomenon so completely out of accord with all precedent?

"The imputation that Dr. Muck is leaving his distinguished position in Berlin," said the statesman in his speech, "because of an offer of a few thousand marks more is shattered on the rock-bound character of a musician who has fought so honorably, so unselfishly for his artistic aims."

Aha! that tells the tale! So don't comfort yourself with the thought that America was spared a scolding because Germans have suddenly come to respect it artistically more than they have hitherto been doing

* * *

Intendant Hülsen gets the chief blame. It almost seems as though the name of Hülsen were synonymous with foolish policy. It was a Hülsen, you'll recollect, who worked like a Trojan for years to keep Wagner's operas out of the Berlin Royal Opera and who tried to practice his bureaucratic domination on Wagner when he found he could not oppose him in any other way.

[208]

Journal-May 24, 1912.

PRUSSIA SEEKS TO RETAIN MUCK

Government Urged to Keep Noted Director in Berlin.

Berlin, May 3.—In the Prussian House of Lords today Professor Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston.

He urged the government do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin. Similar remarks were made in the Chamber of Deputies.

Dr. Muck had the Kaiser's permission to sign a contract for a five-year term with the Symphony Orchestra, beginning next October. Under the circumstances no change in plans is likely to take place.

Post-May 24, 1912.

WANT TO KEEP DR. MUCK HOME

Oppose His Coming to Boston Symphony

BERLIN, May 23.—In the Prussian House of Lords today Professor Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the directorship of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston.

He urged the government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin. Similar remarks were made in the Chamber of Deputies.

Journal-June 28, 1911

Paderewski to Make An American Tour

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday from Europe, where he has been for the last two months. He spent most of his time in Berlin, but gave ten days to Paris and two days on his return, to London. In Berlin he was in frequent conference with Dr. Karl Muck, who next season resumes the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra.

A most interesting announcement that Mr. Ellis made is that he had arranged with Paderewski whereby the great pianist will come to this country in September, 1913, and make an eight month's tour.

While in Berlin Mr. Ellis made final arrangements for the concert tour of Miss Geraldine Farrar, which is to be made under his direction next fall.

Another significant engagement that Mr. Ellis has made is with Fritz Kreisler for a series of fifty concerts in the season of 1913-1914.

Mr. Ellis on his return received the pleasing news that Carnegie Hall is, at this early date, practically sold out for both series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next season.

BERLIN ROYAL OPERA BITTERLY ARRAIGNED

Prussian Lawmaker Condemns Kaiser's Despotic Intendant for Muck's Resignation

European Bureau of Musical America,
Berlin, Goltzstrasse 24,
May 7, 1912.

THE subordination of the position of conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera was the subject of a spirited debate yesterday in the Prussian House of Representatives (Abgeordnetenhaus), and the arbitrary attitude of the censor, Count von Huelsen-Haeseler, received scathing condemnation at the hands of Representative Kopsch, of the Progressive People's Party. Herr Kopsch exposed the causes of Dr. Muck's resignation as conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera, a resignation which has been commented upon in the widest circles, both European and American. The management of the royal theaters has sought to interpret the affair to suit its own convenience through its faithful organ (the Lokal-Anzeiger) and for the purpose of drawing public attention from the policies of the censor. It is plaintly intimated in this paper that "American gold" induced Dr. Muck to leave his Berlin post, but in his speech before the House of Representatives, Mr. Kopsch termed this assertion "an unworthy insinuation." His refutation was approved by stormy applause among the representatives. Mr. Kopsch said:

"The imputation that Dr. Muck is leaving his distinguished position in Berlin because of an offer of a few thousand marks more is shattered on the rock-bound character of a musician who has fought so honorably, so unselfishly for his artistic aims.

"Such an interpretation of Dr. Muck's departure is a convenient shield for the censor of the Berlin Royal Opera. The truth itself comes home to that gentleman, Count von Huelsen, and his associates.

"The despotic authority of Prussian militarism, which extends even to the temples of the muses, cannot be borne forever by the greatest artists of to-day. There was a time when a great composer was content to be looked upon as a sort of house-servant at the court of a reigning prince. He composed symphonies 'to order,' wore a uniform upon request, and did just as 'his highness' desired, without demur. But the times have changed, Count von Huelsen!

"Musical America"

Dr. Carl Muck, Whose Resignation from the Berlin Royal Opera to Become Conductor of the Boston Symphony Occasioned a Sensational Legislative Attack Upon the Opera Management

An artist of international reputation is unable to imagine himself in the seventeenth century. Slavish submission to his highness's will, year in and year out, has become an obsolete number in his répertoire. The opera conductor who has no voice in the selection of works to be performed, nor of the singers who appear in the various rôles, who, in short, is deprived of liberty, is apt to emigrate. Why should this cause astonishment? Freedom is the alpha and omega of the artistic nature. Dr. Muck merely followed the example of his intimate colleagues, Richard Strauss, and Felix von Weingartner. A musician of international celebrity cannot be expected to swallow the dictates of a royal puppet eternally.

"The opera is not an armory," Representative Kopsch continued, "and during intercourse with soloists, conductors and orchestra should not be carried on in the manner of a surly captain-at-arms. Count von Huelsen attains bureaucratic domination at the cost of artistic merit."

These conditions constituted, according to Kopsch, the reasons for Dr. Muck's retirement from a position to which he had devoted his best energies for more than twenty years. His departure is regarded as a heavy loss not only to Berlin but to the German Empire, and the attitude of the House of Representatives is ample proof of the deep regret his resignation has caused among his countrymen.

On October 1 Muck will assume the duties of his new post at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he considers the most splendid and most artistically composed orchestra in the world. Dr. Muck is fifty-two years of age and was born in the university town of Würzburg in Bavaria. He was graduated from the Würzburg High School (Gymnasium) at the age of sixteen, and for a long time had the distinction of being the youngest university student in Germany. He appeared at that tender age as concert pianist at the famous Gewandhaus concerts in Leipsic, to the wonderment of the musical world. At twenty years of age he had won the doctor's degree. His first engagements were in Graz and Prague. Some time later he came to Berlin with Angelo Neuman and conducted the première of Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," after which he was engaged at the Royal Opera, finally receiving the imposing title of Generalmusikdirector. Dr. Muck had neither "influence" nor "connections" to open the way to the commanding position he now enjoys.

His engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the best proof of his popularity in the United States. Dr. Muck will have no military despotism to contend with there, and his friends in the German capital are congratulating him upon his escape from the bonds of Prussian dictatorship into the land of personal freedom.

H. EIKENBERRY.

"Evening World" New York-May 25, 1912.

ALL THIS WAY.

THE Prussians are much upset over the prospective departure of the great Berlin musical conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, to resume the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and are pestering their government to keep him in Germany at any cost.

Only the other day the British press was clapping its hands because Lord Curzon had nailed some old fireplace in the act of sneaking off to America and chained it up at home.

Paris is worried just now for fear a certain famous private collection of pictures destined for the Louvre may be already half pledged to an American purchaser.

Poor old Europe! Forever shedding tears over the way its art treasures, musical geniuses and such swarm up the gangplanks of westward bound steamers! Even if the American millionaire stays at home he has only to put his hand in his pocket and jingle what's there. Straightway the magic sound is heard afar and the next steamer will bring him the best of European "goods" to choose from.

When Mr. J. P. Morgan takes one of his walks on the Continent the nations of Europe go into fits of excitement trying to make him buy things they don't want themselves and keeping him from getting his eye on their special treasures.

They might as well give it up. Things are coming our way, and the only thing to do is to let 'em come. Europeans must make up their minds that presently they will have to run over here from time to time when they want to see their own best pictures and hear their own best music.

DR. MUCK

We fancy the Lokal-Anzieger of Berlin must be either ignorant of the quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or too pig-headed to admit it, when it intimates that "Dr. Karl Muck has been lured away from his position at one of the greatest artistic institutions in Europe, and from his service of the Kaiser, by American gold."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has today no peer in the world. As an artistic institution it is the equal of any. The Berlin Royal Opera is by no means the finest of its kind. As the leader of our great organization Dr. Muck can be far more the great and untrammelled artist than if in "his service of the Kaiser." He is to be handsomely paid, and he deserves to be; but it is not the lure of the gold that brings him here, as those who best know the man can testify.

Herald-May 24, 1912.

PRUSSIANS URGE KEEPING DR. MUCK

Members of Both Houses Ask Government to Induce Him Not to Go to Boston.

BERLIN, May 23—In the Prussian House of Lords today Prof. Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to take the directorship of the Symphony orchestra at Boston. He urged the government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin. Similar remarks were made in the Chamber of Deputies.

Advertiser-May 24, 1912.

GERMANS INSISTENT THAT DR. MUCK STAY IN BERLIN

Berlin, May 23.—In the Prussian house of lords today Prof. Waldeyer, president of the academy of sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the directorship of the Symphony orchestra at Boston.

He urged the government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin.

Similar remarks were made in the chamber of deputies.

[209]

Journal-May 24, 1912.

PRUSSIA SEEKS TO RETAIN MUCK

Government Urged to Keep Noted Director in Berlin.

Berlin, May 8.—In the Prussian House of Lords today Professor Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston.

He urged the government do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin. Similar remarks were made in the Chamber of Deputies.

Dr. Muck had the Kaiser's permission to sign a contract for a five-year term with the Symphony Orchestra, beginning next October. Under the circumstances no change in plans is likely to take place.

Post-May 24, 1912.

WANT TO KEEP DR. MUCK HOME

Oppose His Coming to Boston Symphony

BERLIN, May 23.—In the Prussian House of Lords today Professor Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the directorship of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston.

He urged the government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin. Similar remarks were made in the Chamber of Deputies.

Journal-June 28, 1911

Paderewski to Make An American Tour

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday from Europe, where he has been for the last two months. He spent most of his time in Berlin, but gave ten days to Paris and two days on his return, to London. In Berlin he was in frequent conference with Dr. Karl Muck, who next season resumes the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra.

A most interesting announcement that Mr. Ellis made is that he had arranged with Paderewski whereby the great pianist will come to this country in September, 1913, and make an eight month's tour.

While in Berlin Mr. Ellis made final arrangements for the concert tour of Miss Geraldine Farrar, which is to be made under his direction next fall.

Another significant engagement that Mr. Ellis has made is with Fritz Kreisler for a series of fifty concerts in the season of 1913-1914.

Mr. Ellis on his return received the pleasing news that Carnegie Hall is, at this early date, practically sold out for both series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next season.

BERLIN ROYAL OPERA BITTERLY ARRAIGNED

Prussian Lawmaker Condemns Kaiser's Despotic Intendant for Muck's Resignation

European Bureau of Musical America,
Berlin, Goltzstrasse 24,
May 7, 1912.

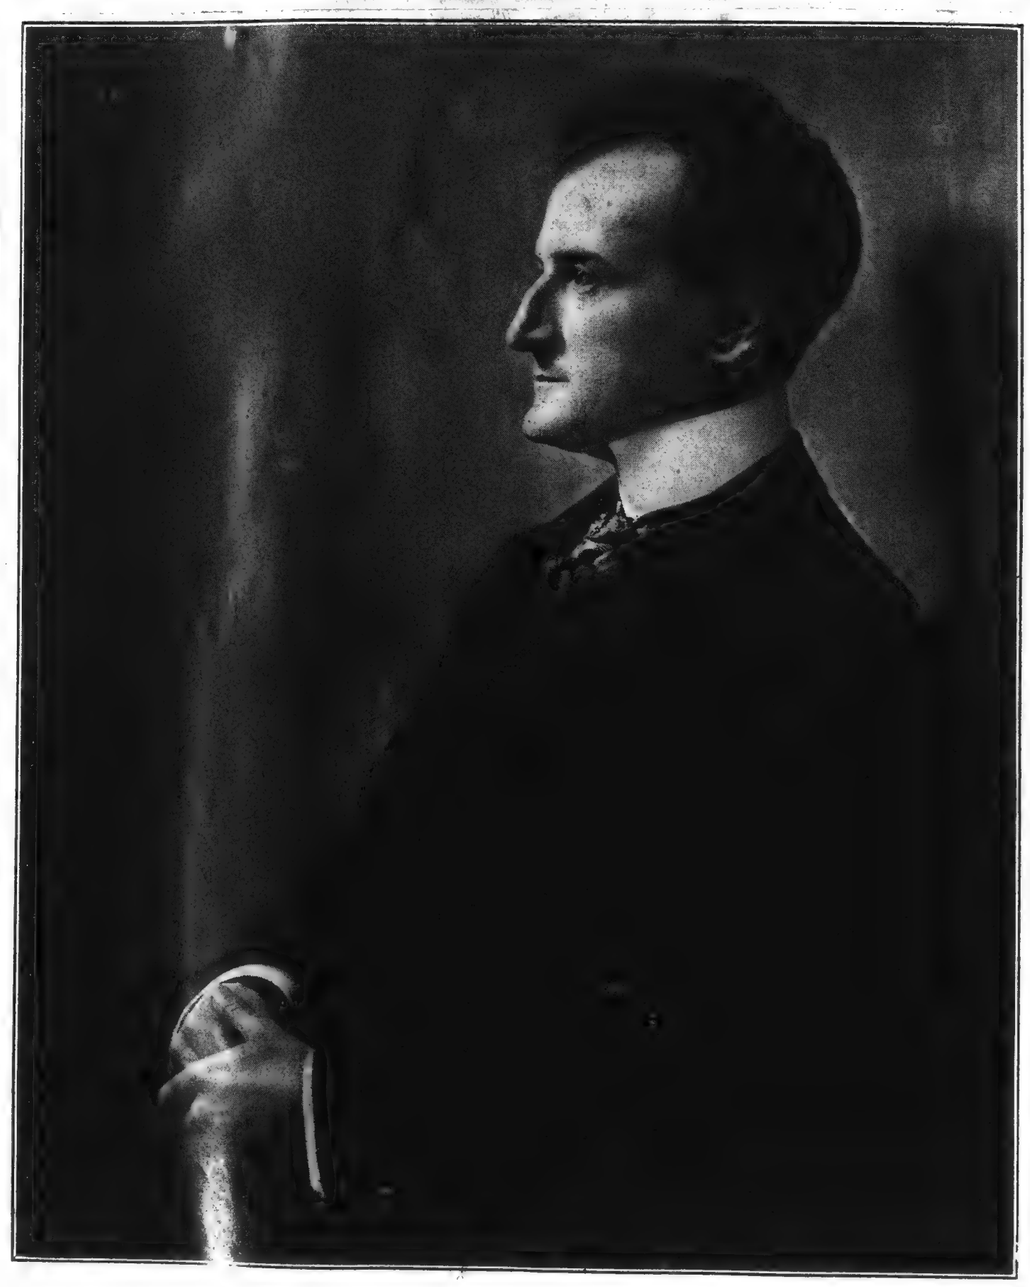
THE subordination of the position of conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera was the subject of a spirited debate yesterday in the Prussian House of Representatives (Abgeordnetenhaus), and the arbitrary attitude of the censor, Count von Huelsen-Haeseler, received scathing condemnation at the hands of Representative Kopsch, of the Progressive People's Party. Herr Kopsch exposed the causes of Dr. Muck's resignation as conductor of the Berlin Royal Opera, a resignation which has been commented upon in the widest circles, both European and American. The management of the royal theaters has sought to interpret the affair to suit its own convenience through its faithful organ (the Lokal-Anzeiger) and for the purpose of drawing public attention from the policies of the censor. It is plaintly intimated in this paper that "American gold" induced Dr. Muck to leave his Berlin post, but in his speech before the House of Representatives, Mr. Kopsch termed this assertion "an unworthy insinuation." His refutation was approved by stormy applause among the representatives. Mr. Kopsch said:

"The imputation that Dr. Muck is leaving his distinguished position in Berlin because of an offer of a few thousand marks more is shattered on the rock-bound character of a musician who has fought so honorably, so unselfishly for his artistic aims.

"Such an interpretation of Dr. Muck's departure is a convenient shield for the censor of the Berlin Royal Opera. The truth itself comes home to that gentleman, Count von Huelsen, and his associates.

"The despotic authority of Prussian militarism, which extends even to the temples of the muses, cannot be borne forever by the greatest artists of to-day. There was a time when a great composer was content to be looked upon as a sort of house-servant at the court of a reigning prince. He composed symphonies 'to order,' wore a uniform upon request, and did just as 'his highness' desired, without demur. But the times have changed, Count von Huelsen!

"Musical America"



Dr. Carl Muck, Whose Resignation from the Berlin Royal Opera to Become Conductor of the Boston Symphony Occasioned a Sensational Legislative Attack Upon the Opera Management

An artist of international reputation is unable to imagine himself in the seventeenth century. Slavish submission to his highness's will, year in and year out, has become an obsolete number in his répertoire. The opera conductor who has no voice in the selection of works to be performed nor of the singers who appear in the various rôles, who, in short, is deprived of liberty, is apt to emigrate. Why should this cause astonishment? Freedom is the alpha and omega of the artistic nature. Dr. Muck merely followed the example of his intimate colleagues, Richard Strauss and Felix von Weingartner. A musician of international celebrity cannot be expected to swallow the dictates of a royal puppet eternally.

"The opera is not an armory," Representative Kopsch continued, "and during intercourse with soloists, conductors and orchestra should not be carried on in the manner of a surly captain-at-arms. Count von Huelsen attains bureaucratic domination at the cost of artistic merit."

These conditions constituted, according to Kopsch, the reasons for Dr. Muck's retirement from a position to which he had devoted his best energies for more than twenty years. His departure is regarded as a heavy loss not only to Berlin but to the German Empire, and the attitude of the House of Representatives is ample proof of the deep regret his resignation has caused among his countrymen.

On October 1 Muck will assume the duties of his new post at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he considers the most splendid and most artistically composed orchestra in the world. Dr. Muck is fifty-two years of age and was born in the university town of Würzburg in Bavaria. He was graduated from the Würzburg High School (Gymnasium) at the age of sixteen, and for a long time had the distinction of being the youngest university student in Germany. He appeared at that tender age as concert pianist at the famous Gewandhaus concerts in Leipsic, to the wonderment of the musical world. At twenty years of age he had won the doctor's degree. His first engagements were in Graz and Prague. Some time later he came to Berlin with Angelo Neumann and conducted the première of Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," after which he was engaged at the Royal Opera, finally receiving the imposing title of General-director. Dr. Muck had neither "influence" nor "connections" to open the way to the commanding position he now enjoys.

His engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the proof of his popularity in the United States. Dr. Muck will have no military despot to contend with there, and his friends in the German capital are congratulating him upon his escape from the bonds of Prussian dictatorship into the land of personal freedom.

H. EIKENBERRY.

DR. MUCK

We fancy the Lokal-Anzieger of Berlin must be either ignorant of the quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or too pig-headed to admit it, when it intimates that "Dr. Karl Muck has been lured away from his position at one of the greatest artistic institutions in Europe, and from his service of the Kaiser, by American gold."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has today no peer in the world. As an artistic institution it is the equal of any. The Berlin Royal Opera is by no means the finest of its kind. As the leader of our great organization Dr. Muck can be far more the great and untrammelled artist than if in "his service of the Kaiser." He is to be handsomely paid, and he deserves to be; but it is not the lure of the gold that brings him here, as those who best know the man can testify.

"Evening World" New York-May 25, 1912.

ALL THIS WAY.

THE Prussians are much upset over the prospective departure of the great Berlin musical conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, to resume the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and are pestering their government to keep him in Germany at any cost.

Only the other day the British press was clapping its hands because Lord Curzon had nailed some old fireplace in the act of sneaking off to America and chained it up at home.

Paris is worried just now for fear a certain famous private collection of pictures destined for the Louvre may be already half pledged to an American purchaser.

Poor old Europe! Forever shedding tears over the way its art treasures, musical geniuses and such swarm up the gangplanks of westward bound steamers! Even if the American millionaire stays at home he has only to put his hand in his pocket and jingle what's there. Straightway the magic sound is heard afar and the next steamer will bring him the best of European "goods" to choose from.

When Mr. J. P. Morgan takes one of his walks on the Continent the nations of Europe go into fits of excitement trying to make him buy things they don't want themselves and keeping him from getting his eye on their special treasures.

They might as well give it up. Things are coming our way, and the only thing to do is to let 'em come. Europeans must make up their minds that presently they will have to run over here from time to time when they want to see their own best pictures and hear their own best music.

[209]

Herald-May 24, 1912.

PRUSSIANS URGE KEEPING DR. MUCK

Members of Both Houses Ask Government to Induce Him Not to Go to Boston.

BERLIN, May 23—In the Prussian House of Lords today Prof. Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to take the directorship of the Symphony orchestra at Boston. He urged the government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin. Similar remarks were made in the Chamber of Deputies.

Advertiser-May 24, 1912.

GERMANS INSISTENT THAT DR. MUCK STAY IN BERLIN

Berlin, May 23.—In the Prussian house of lords today Prof. Waldeyer, president of the academy of sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the directorship of the Symphony orchestra at Boston.

He urged the government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin.

Similar remarks were made in the chamber of deputies.

Post-June 28, 1912

DR. MUCK TO RETURN TO SYMPHONY

Manager Ellis, Home From Europe, Tells Orchestra Plans

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned yesterday morning from Europe, where he has been for two months. He spent most of his time in Berlin, but gave 10 days to Paris and two days, on his return, to London. In Berlin he was in frequent conference with Dr. Karl Muck, who next season resumes the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra.

FAREWELL IN BERLIN

Dr. Muck made his farewell appearance at the Berlin Opera two weeks ago with a performance of "Tristan und Isolde." Mr. Ellis said that the cable reports did not exaggerate the tribute paid to the distinguished conductor by the crowded house. It was said in Berlin that no such demonstration had ever been made for a conductor in that city.

Dr. Muck is now in Bayreuth, where he will be until the middle of August. He has made a number of important engagements for the orchestra for the coming year. Among them is that of the distinguished violoncellist Urak, principal violoncellist of the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. Mr. Urak will take the place of Alwin Schroeder.

Dr. Muck has made many interesting plans for the next season's work, which will be announced later. He, with Mrs. Muck, sails for America the end of September and they have taken an apartment on Commonwealth avenue, where they will make their home.

A most interesting announcement that Mr. Ellis made is that he has arranged with Paderewski whereby the great pianist will come to this country in September, 1913, and make an eight months' tour. There has been a vast amount of uncertainty about the time of Paderewski's return, for he has not been in America since the season of 1908-09.

One of Mr. Ellis' purposes in going abroad was to persuade him to come to America this fall, but Paderewski said that, as within the last year he had made a tour of South America and of South Africa, he felt that he wanted to spend the coming winter at his home in Switzerland and fulfill some long-promised engagements on the Continent.

Miss Farrar Coming

While in Berlin Mr. Ellis made final arrangements for the concert tour of Miss Geraldine Farrar, which is to be made under his direction next fall. Miss Farrar will have associated with her Glen Hall, the tenor, Edmund Jahn, basso, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist. The tour necessarily must be of brief duration, for Miss Farrar's duties at the Metropolitan Opera House begin early in November. Her concerts will begin the end of September and she will travel about six weeks.

One of the interesting incidents of her stay in Paris this spring was the bestowal on her by the Ministry of Public Instruction and Fine Arts of the Academic palms. This decoration has been given to very few singers who are not French.

Another significant engagement that Mr. Ellis has made is with Fritz Kreisler for a series of 50 concerts in the season of 1913-1914. As already announced, Kreisler comes to America next November under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With it he will appear as soloist in a series of its concerts in Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and elsewhere, and under its auspices he will give a limited number of recitals in the larger cities, one of which will be in Symphony Hall, Boston.

The engagement of Kreisler by the Boston Symphony Orchestra follows upon a similar engagement of Josef Hofmann last year, when the orchestra had the exclusive services of that distinguished artist.

Mr. Ellis on his return received the pleasing news that Carnegie Hall is, at this early date, practically sold out for both series of Boston Symphony concerts next season.

N.Y. Times May 24, 1912

URGE PRUSSIA TO KEEP MUCK

Legislators Would Induce Conductor Not to Go to Boston.

BERLIN, May 23.—In the Prussian House of Lords to-day Prof. Waldeyer, President of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the Directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He urged the Government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin. Similar remarks were made in the Chamber of Deputies.

Herald-June 28, 1912

PADEREWSKI TO PLAY IN BOSTON

Manager Ellis of Symphony Has Arranged for Eight Months' Tour of Country.

FAMOUS 'CELLIST ENGAGED

Conductor Muck Has Contract with Urak of Bayreuth Festival Orchestra.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned yesterday from Europe where he has been for the last two months. He spent most of his time in Berlin, but gave 10 days to Paris and two days, on his return, to London. In Berlin he was in frequent conference with Karl Muck who, next season, will resume the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck made his farewell appearance at the Berlin Opera two weeks ago with a performance of "Tristan and Isolde."

Mr. Ellis said that the cable reports did not exaggerate the tribute paid to Dr. Muck by the crowded house. It was said in Berlin that no such demonstration had ever before been made for a conductor in that city. Dr. Muck is now in Bayreuth, where he will be until the middle of August. He has made a number of important engagements for the orchestra for the coming year, among them that of the distinguished 'cellist, Urak, principal 'cellist of the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. Mr. Urak will take the place of Alwin Schroeder. Dr. Muck has made many interesting plans for the next season's work which will be announced later. He, with Mrs. Muck, will sail for America the last of September and they have taken an apartment in Commonwealth avenue.

Paderewski Is Coming.

One of the announcements that Mr. Ellis made is that he has arranged with Paderewski to come to this country in September, 1913, for an eight-months' tour. There has been a vast amount of uncertainty about the time of Paderewski's return for he has not been in America since the season of 1908-1909. One of Mr. Ellis's purposes in going abroad was to persuade him to come to America this fall, but Paderewski said that as within the last year he had made a tour of South America and of South Africa, he felt that he wanted to spend the coming winter at his home in Switzerland and fulfill some long-promised engagements on the continent.

While in Berlin Mr. Ellis made final arrangements for the concert tour of Miss Geraldine Farrar, which is to be made under his direction next fall. Miss Farrar will have associated with her Glen Hall, tenor; Edmund Jahn, basso, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist. The tour must necessarily be of brief duration for Miss Farrar's duties at the Metropolitan Opera House begin early in November. Her concerts will begin the end of September and she will travel about six weeks.

One of the intersting incidents of her stay in Paris this spring was the bestowal on her by the Ministry of Public Instruction and Fine Arts of the Academic Palms. This decoration has been given to very few singers who are not French.

Contract with Kreisler.

Another significant engagement that Mr. Ellis has made is with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, for a series of 50 concerts in the season of 1913-1914. As already announced, Kreisler comes to America next November under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony orchestra. With it he will appear as soloist in a series of its concerts in Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and elsewhere, and under its auspices he will give a limited number of recitals in the larger cities, one of which will be in Symphony Hall, Boston. The engagement of Kreisler by the Boston Symphony orchestra follows a similar engagement of Josef Hofmann, pianist, last year, when the orchestra had the exclusive services of that distinguished artist.

Mr. Ellis, on his return, received the pleasing news that Carnegie Hall, New York, is at this early date practically sold out for both series of Boston Symphony concerts next season.

N.Y. American-May 24, 1912

GERMANY WANTS DR. MUCK

Berlin, May 23.—In the Prussian House of Lords to-day Professor Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the directorship of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston. He urged the Government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin.

N.Y. Herald-May 24, 1912

URGE DR. MUCK TO STAY.

BERLIN, Thursday.—In the Prussian House of Lords to-day Professor Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the directorship of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston. He urged the government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin. Similar remarks were made in the Chamber of Deputies.

Advertiser-June 28, 1912

PADEREWSKI COMING IN SEPTEMBER, 1913

ANNOUNCEMENT MADE BY CHARLES A. ELLIS

Manager of Symphony Orchestra Returns From Two Months Trip in Europe.

That Paderewski, the great pianist, will come to America in September, 1913, for an eight months' tour, is one of the announcements made by Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who returned yesterday morning from Europe, where he has been for the last two months.

There has been a vast amount of uncertainty about the time of Paderewski's return, for he has not been in America since the season of 1908-1909. One of Mr. Ellis' purposes in going abroad was to persuade him to come to America this fall, but Paderewski said that, as within the last year he had made a tour of South America and of South Africa, he felt that he wanted to spend the coming winter at his home in Switzerland and fulfill some long promised engagements on the continent.

Mr. Ellis spent most of his time in Berlin, but gave 10 days to Paris and two days, on his return, to London.

In Berlin he was in frequent conference with Dr. Karl Muck, who next season resumes the conductorship of the Symphony orchestra. Dr. Muck made his farewell appearance at the Berlin opera two weeks ago, with a performance of "Tristan and Isolde."

Mr. Ellis said that the cable reports did not exaggerate the tribute paid to the distinguished conductor by the crowded house. It was said in Berlin that no such demonstration had ever been made for a conductor in that city.

Dr. Muck is now in Bayreuth, where he will be until the middle of August. He has made a number of important engagements for the orchestra for the coming year, among them is that of the distinguished 'cellist, Urak, principal 'cellist of the Bayreuth Festival orchestra. Mr. Urak will take the place of Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Dr. Muck, with Mrs. Muck, sails for America the end of September and they have taken an apartment in Commonwealth ave., where they will make their home.

Geraldine Farrar's Plans.

While in Berlin Mr. Ellis made final arrangements for the concert tour of Miss Geraldine Farrar which is to be made under his direction next fall.

Miss Farrar will have associated with her Glen Hall, the tenor; Edmund Jahn, basso, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist. The tour must necessarily be of brief duration for Miss Farrar's duties at the Metropolitan Opera House begin early in November. Her concerts will begin the end of September and she will travel about six weeks.

One of the interesting incidents of her stay in Paris this spring was the bestowal on her by the ministry of public instruction and fine arts of the Academic Palms. This decoration has been given to very few singers who are not French.

Another significant engagement that Mr. Ellis has made is with Fritz Kreisler for a series of 50 concerts in the season of 1913-1914. As already announced, Kreisler comes to America next November under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mr. Ellis on his return received the pleasing news that Carnegie hall is, at this early date, practically sold out for both series of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts next season.

Traveler-June 28, 1912

MANAGER ELLIS BACK FROM EUROPE

Brings Contracts from Paderewski, Kreisler and Geraldine Farrar.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just back from two months in London, Paris and Berlin, brings a budget of good news for Boston music lovers. While in Berlin he had the pleasure of participating in the wonderful farewell demonstration tendered to Karl Muck, who comes to Boston this October to take charge of the Symphony orchestra.

Dr. Muck and Mrs. Muck sail for America in September and will reside on Commonwealth avenue. Dr. Muck has engaged Mr. Urak, principal 'cellist of the Bayreuth festival orchestra, to succeed Alwyn Schroeder in the Symphony orchestra.

Mr. Ellis announces that he has succeeded in inducing Mr. Paderewski to come here for an eight months' tour, commencing September, 1913; also concluded arrangements for an American tour by Geraldine Farrar and her concert company and one by Kreisler, the eminent violinist. Kreisler is to appear exclusively with the Symphony orchestra.

Mr. Ellis says Carnegie Hall is practically sold out for the 1912-1913 Boston Symphony concerts.

Globe-June 28, 1912

MR ELLIS BACK WITH CONTRACTS

Paderewski Engaged for Tour in 1913-1914.

Miss Farrar's Fall Tour Arranged—New 'Cellist Secured.

Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned yesterday morning from Europe, where he has been for the last two months. He spent most of his time in Berlin, but gave 10 days to Paris and two days, on his return, to London. In Berlin he was in frequent conference with Dr Karl Muck, who next season resumes the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra. Dr Muck made his farewell appearance at the Berlin Opera two weeks ago with a performance of "Tristan and Isolde." Mr Ellis said that the cable reports did not exaggerate the tribute paid to the distinguished conductor, that it was said to be a demonstration such as never had been made for a conductor in that city.

Dr Muck is now in Bayreuth, where he will be until the middle of August. He has made a number of important engagements for the orchestra for the coming year. Among them is that of the distinguished 'cellist, Urak, principal 'cellist of the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra. Mr Urak will take the place of Alwin Schroeder. Dr and Mrs Muck will sail for America the end of September, They have taken an apartment in Commonwealth av, where they will make their home.

A most interesting announcement that Mr Ellis made is that he has arranged with Paderewski whereby the great pianist will come to this country in September, 1913, and make an eight-month tour. There has been a vast amount of uncertainty about the time of Paderewski's return, for he has not been in America since the season of 1908-1909.

While in Berlin Mr Ellis completed arrangements for the concert tour of Miss Geraldine Farrar, which is to be made under his direction next Fall. Miss Farrar will have associated with her Glen Hall, the tenor; Edmund Jahn, basso, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist. The tour will begin the last of September and continue about six weeks.

One of the interesting incidents of Miss Farrar's stay in Paris this Spring was the bestowal upon her by the Ministry of Public Instruction and Fine Arts of the "Academic Palms." This decoration has been given to very few singers who are not French.

Another significant engagement that Mr Ellis has made is with Fritz Kreisler for a series of 50 concerts in the season of 1913-1914. As already announced, Kreisler comes to America next November under exclusive contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With it he will appear as soloist in a series of its concerts in Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and elsewhere, and under its auspices he will give a limited number of recitals in the larger cities, one of which will be in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Mr Ellis, on his return, received the pleasing news that Carnegie Hall is, at this early date, practically sold out for both series of Boston Symphony concerts next season.

New York Review May 26 1912

Herr Muck und die deutsche Gesetzgebungskörperschaft.

Unsere Musikkreise werden über die folgende Berliner Nachricht recht erstaunt die Augenbrauen emporziehen. Die gesetzgebenden Körperschaften des großen deutschen Reiches bemühen sich, um einen Musiker im Lande zurückzuhalten. Man höre:

„Im preußischen Herrenhause lenkte Professor Waldeyer, der Präsident der Akademie der Wissenschaften, die Aufmerksamkeit darauf, daß Dr. Karl Muck beabsichtige, nach Boston zu gehen, um dort die Leitung des Symphonie-Orchesters zu übernehmen. Er forderte die Regierung auf, ihr Aeußerstes aufzubieten, um Dr. Muck zum Verbleiben in Berlin zu veranlassen. Eine ähnliche Anregung wurde auch im Abgeordnetenhause gemacht."

Welche Bedeutung muß dieser Kapellmeister im deutschen Reiche erlangt haben, und auf welche künstlerische Erziehung der Reichsvertreter läßt diese Bewegung schließen? Unsere Herren Kapellmeister können noch lange warten, ehe der Congreß sich für sie nur interessiren, viel weniger aber sich um ihr Bleiben im Lande bemühen würde. Die Kundgebungen, die von den Staatsmännern aus Washington gelegentlich laut werden, tragen ein ganz anderes Gepräge. Als nämlich Ty Cobb, der handfeste Detroiter Baseballspieler „suspendirt" wurde, erhielt er eine Depesche von den Vertretern des Staates Georgia, in der ihm die Sympathie und das Vertrauen der Herren ausgedrückt wurde. Wenn unsere Kapellmeister statt den Taktstock, den Baseball „bat" schwingen würden, ja — dann könnten auch sie auf besondere Beachtung Anspruch erheben.

Ob Herr Muck durch diese seltene Ehrung sich bewogen fühlen wird, in Berlin zu verbleiben, statt nach Boston zu kommen, das erscheint trotzdem mehr als fraglich.

[210]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ... STAATSZEITUNG

Address ...

Date ... MAY 28 1912

Dr. Muck's Scheiden.

Berlin, 22. Mai. Im preußischen Herrenhause besprach Professor Dr. Waldeyer das Bostoner Engagement des Generalmusikdirektors Dr. Karl Muck. Er bedauerte dessen Scheiden und erklärte, Dr. Muck gehe nicht aus pekuniären Gründen weg. Nur die Verhältnisse an der Berliner Hofoper trügen die Schuld daran, daß er einem Ruf von auswärts folge.

From EVENING JOURNAL,

Address New York City.

Date MAY 24 1912

Germany Wants Dr. Muck

Berlin, May 24.—In the Prussian House of Lords Professor Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the directorship of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston. He urged the Government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York

Date MAY 24 1912

WANT TO RETAIN DR. MUCK

Germans Would Have Imperial Government Take Action.

Berlin, May 23.—In the Prussian House of Lords to-day Professor Waldeyer, president of the Academy of Sciences, called attention to the intended departure of Dr. Karl Muck from Germany to assume the directorship of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston. He urged the government to do its utmost to induce Dr. Muck to remain in Berlin.

Similar remarks were made in the Chamber of Deputies.

It was officially announced on January 11 that Dr. Muck had been engaged to return to the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of four years. He left Boston to become general musical director of the Imperial Theatres by the German Emperor's appointment It was understood then that he would return to Boston when his engagement abroad was ended. The efforts of the Germans to detain him have made his stay a longer one than he intended.

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND